The author of this brief but compelling biography, poet and New York Sun book critic Adam Kirsch, writes that Disraeli's Jewishness was the central fact about him. "It didn't matter that he was born in London like his father before him or that he spoke no language but English. It didn't matter that he was, in fact, a practising Christian, baptized into the Church of England." Former British prime minister Winston Churchill wrote that Disraeli never became wholly assimilated to English ways of life. It was as though he remained a permanent immigrant in the country of his birth.

It is sometimes overlooked that Disraeli, like his father, was a prolific and widely read author. Before he entered Parliament, six of Disraeli's novels, several fantasies, satires, verse, travel journalism and political pamphlets were in print. His novel, Alroy, set in the 12th century, was written after an extensive tour of the Near East, including Palestine. It deals with Jewish persecution, survival and national identity. The book's messianic hero, David Alroy, seeks to achieve positive Jewish selfhood through a redeemed religio-political state in Palestine.

Disraeli's greatest legislative achievement was the passage of the Second Reform Bill in 1867, which gave the right to vote to most male heads of households – a measure more liberal than even the Liberals had been ready to contemplate. Many of his Conservative colleagues felt betrayed. The result was that Disraeli laid himself open to charges of opportunism and hypocrisy. The author suggests that "this compounded the distrust he already inspired – as a novelist, a dandy, an adventurer and, of course, a Jew."

In 1839, he married a wealthy widow 12 years his senior. The match considerably enhanced his social position and provided him with financial security. "Dizzy married me for my money," his wife was known to say, but "if he had the chance again, he would marry me for love." Actually, the union turned out to be lasting and successful.

The author is convinced that Disraeli's Jewishness gave him the confidence to compete with the best-born men in England; it gave him the dignity he sustained through the most wounding attacks; it licensed him to see his passage through the world as a noble adventurer.

Once, baited by an anti-Semite, he famously responded, "When the ancestors of the right honourable gentlemen were brutal savages in an unknown land, mine were priests in the Temple of Solomon."

Disraeli felt no contradiction between his adherence to the Anglican faith and his pride in being Jewish. In arguing that Jews should not be excluded from Parliament, he suggested that Christianity owed most of its basic tenets to the Hebrew Bible and to the Jewish teachings of Jesus.

Among Disraeli's major achievements was the purchase of a share in the Suez Canal company for Britain, with the help of a four-million-pound loan from the Rothschild family.

This engaging volume devotes as much attention to the Jewish side of Disraeli's life and career as to his political activities. In both spheres, he remains a many-sided, enduringly provocative figure.

Living a green Sukkot

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

It's so obvious, really. If there were one Jewish holiday that lends itself to the appreciation of the environment, it must be Sukkot. There's the harvest. The changing of the seasons. And of course, eating, entertaining and even sleeping outdoors for a week. Today, a look at some websites that suggest how to celebrate Sukkot the green way.

First though, I would be derelict if I didn't acknowledge other holidays that have green ties. Many Jewish festivals have agricultural connections: Passover celebrates the spring planting; Shavuot commemorates the season's first fruits; and of course, Tu b'Shvat is a sort of Jewish arbour day that falls in mid-winter. [tinyurl.com/sukkot09]

Today, however, the enviro-focus is on Sukkot. Are you looking for something inspirational to discuss while sitting in your sukkah? The Coalition on the Environment and Jewish Life has gathered several relevant quotations related to the Book of Kohelet (Ecclesiastes), which is traditionally read during Sukkot: "When God created the first human beings, God led them around the Garden of Eden and said: 'Look at my works! See how beautiful they are, how excellent! Take care not to spoil or destroy My world, for if you do, there will be no one to repair it after you.'" [tinyurl.com/sukkot06]

Ever consider creating a recycled sukkah? Canfei Nesharim, an organization that provides a Torah-based approach to understanding environmental issues, suggests diverting materials headed for the recycle bin (or garbage!) and using them to beautify our sukkah. I like the idea of hanging strawberry baskets upside down and creating reusable, water-resistant paper chains. (I'm not sure if the Israelites ever dreamed of hanging old CDs in their sukkot.) [tiny url.com/sukkot03]

Stay on that same page for ideas about what to eat in the sukkah: locally grown, in-season produce served on non-disposable place settings, of course. Richard Schwartz goes a step further and suggests that Sukkot is the perfect time to try vegetarianism. [tinyurl.com/sukkot 08] (Please note that there are opinions that eating meat is a required element for the enjoyment of Jewish holidays. If in doubt, speak to your rabbi. [tinyurl.com/meatchag]

The holiday of Sukkot is also tied closely to water. One of the happiest ceremonies in Jewish tradition took place during this festival. While the Temple was standing, a special water pouring ceremony called Simchat Bet HaShoavah was held. The drawing of the water was performed with such intense joy that the following saying remains a testament: "He who has not seen the rejoicing at the Simchat Bet HaShoavah, has never seen rejoicing in his life." [tinyurl.com/sukkot04]

The ancient Jews of the Middle East understood the centrality of water, but how do you reawaken those sensitivities in North America? Canfei Nesharim has created a mini-site titled True Joy, Through Water. There are classes and source sheets about the importance of water, a look at the mitzvah of Bal Tashchit (do not destroy) and activities such as Torah, math and the environment. [tinyurl.com/sukkot05]

Is there a special bond between Sukkot, the environment and women? Last year, Lilith created an eight-page supplement titled Eco-Ushpizin. Ushpizin is the traditional welcome given to Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, Moses, Aaron and King David during the seven days of Sukkot. [tinyurl.com/fl4zy] Several women were asked whom they'd invite to celebrate Sukkot and the environment. Barbara Lerman-Golomb had two people on her list: "My mother. In the 1950s, she had three natural childbirths when it was unheard of. She was progressive in a lot of ways. Also, [nature writer] Rachel Carson." [tinyurl.com/sukkot02]

The last word about the special connection between Sukkot and the environment goes to Leah Korican. "Under the sukkah there is a chance to connect with the seasons and with generations of people sitting together under the stars. My daughter's first outing, at eight days old, was to a Sukkot celebration and last night, at the same sukkah she shook the lulav with me in the six cardinal directions. I felt a surge of joy and hope for the future feeling these complex pleasures; our smallness in the night sky, the constancy of the stars and seasons as we age and grow, and the shared warmth of our bodies as our voices lift, together in the dark." [tinyurl.com/sukkot07]

Orthodox Union program hits Toronto universities

By RITA POLIAKOV
Special to The CJN

Toronto is the home of the Maple Leafs, the CN Tower and, as of last month, the Jewish Learning Initiative on Campus (JLIC).

Earlier this fall, the Orthodox Union (OU), in conjunction with Hillel, introduced the JLIC to Toronto university campuses.

The JLIC has been set up at York University and the University of Toronto, and is available to students from other Toronto-area campuses.

The program, which is run on 15 campuses in North America, was created to continue Jewish education after high school. It promotes Orthodox Jewish culture on campus through one-on-one counselling, social programming, guest speakers and daily seminars.

While the program is available at American universities such as Yale and New York University, this is the first time it has come to Canada.

Toronto universities were chosen because of their high number of Jewish students.

"There is a large observant Orthodox community at York, and basically I think the partnership [between OU and Hillel] stemmed from a need to engage and educate the students who want to learn more about Jewish law," said Steven Kraft, Hillel's program associate at York.

Rabbi Aaron and Miriam Greenberg were chosen to serve as the campus Torah educators in Toronto. Both are natives of the city and York graduates.

While Miriam Greenberg does most of her work from home, her husband is often on campus, giving lectures, organizing social events or simply talking with students.

"There's a wide range of programming. [We have] informal classes and high-level learning similar to what they would get in a yeshiva in Israel," Rabbi Greenberg said.

The program is unique because of its flexibility. While Rabbi Greenberg provides daily classes on campus to all students, regardless of their knowledge and background, he also meets with students at coffee shops or even in his home.

"The fact that you have a senior educator who's available to educate all day, that is new and innovative," Rabbi Greenberg said.

Since the program started, Rabbi Greenberg has been busy. His one-on-one counselling sessions include advice on dating, divorce, career and Jewish philosophy.

"I spend [all day] talking with students, which is good. It's the way it should be. I really want to be there for students in the day time, to foster relationships. Even for Shabbat, a lot of students don't have anywhere to go to. I get them to know my family and my kids, to feel that Jewish life," he said.

To Kraft, the rabbi's passion sets him apart.

"He's just a true educator. He just really engages [students] with his passion for educating. Students really enjoy his presence on campus, and he constantly has students in his office," Kraft said.

Unlike some American universities, York and U of T are known as commuter schools. Many students there don't live on campus, which is a challenge for Hillel and the JLIC.

"It's difficult to engage students outside of campus. When they have breaks in class on campus, we can engage them, but they have a whole life [off campus]."

Still, Rabbi Greenberg is able to work around that.

"It's not just a matter of learning. It could be talking, shmoozing, having a coffee with students. We're not locked into a location. Some students don't want to come to Hillel. Wherever the students want to meet and talk, I'm flexible."

Fundraiser held for Strike Out Cancer

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

For years, good friends Harry March, Laurin Saltzman, Elias Benaim, Marty Firestone and Bernie Shapiro used to meet for lunch once a week. Everything changed when, in 2004, March was diagnosed with lung cancer.

Soon after, he died.

The remaining four men decided to organize the bowling party and Princess Margaret Hospital fundraiser Strike Out Cancer to honour March's memory.

Firestone said that since its first year in 2005, the event has raised nearly $100,000 for early lung cancer detection at Princess Margaret.

This year's event, held at Playtime Bowl on Sept. 13, raised more than $61,000 (at press time, final tallies were not in).

Unlike most charity programs, there was no admission charge, Firestone said. Money was raised through lane sponsors, a silent auction, the sale of mystery bags, and general donations. At this year's event, special guest Doug Gilmour, a former Toronto Maple Leaf captain, signed autographs, posed for pictures with participants and helped with the auction.

A media release from the Princess Margaret Hospital Foundation said that the funds raised by Strike Out Cancer have helped support the hospital's participation in the international Early Lung Cancer Screening Study. The study was carried out at the institution's Lusi Wong Early Lung Cancer Screening Facility, which detects early stages of cancer, long before symptoms occur.

While "lung cancer is the most common cause of cancer death among Canadians, when caught early it has a cure rate of 70 to 80 per cent," the release states.

Studies have shown that computed tomography (CT) can help identify lung cancers at their earliest stage. It detected up to six times as many Stage 1 cancers as chest radiography, the release noted.

In Memory of
Stacey Louise Baer
(Jan. 18, 1971 - Oct. 11, 2004)

When a daughter is special and our hero, her love lives on. Although we continue to exist in the dark shadows of the soul, Stacey's joyful spirit will always be an example of how qualities like courage, can and will, continue to inspire us all. Many of us have good flames and we live a long life. Other of us have intense flames that burn deeply and passionately, but are short. Stacey, we will carry your heart in our hearts forever

Election 2008

Opposition candidates attack 'useless election'

By LAURA STRICKER
Special to The CJN

The candidates in Willowdale may be battling each other for votes, but the ones from the opposition parties agree on one thing: the upcoming federal election is unnecessary.

"The election is [Prime Minister] Stephen Harper's way of trying to re-establish the status quo," said Martha Hall Findlay, the riding's Liberal incumbent.

The Willowdale riding runs from Highway 401 in the south to Steeles Avenue in the north. In the east, it's bounded by Victoria Park Avenue, Highway 404, Finch Avenue and Leslie Street. The west branch of the Don River, Bathurst Street, and Yonge Street form its western border.

As of 2006, its population was 129,356 – which represents an increase of 19.3 per cent since 2001, although the riding's boundaries were redrawn in the interim. Approximately six per cent of the riding is Jewish.

Besides Hall Findlay and Wallace, Jake Karns is running for the Conservatives, and Lou Carcasole is representing the Green Party.

Hall Findlay – her party's associate finance critic and a former leadership candidate who won the riding with almost 60 per cent of the vote in a byelection last March – is pushing for an environmentally friendly Canada, something she said Harper has made no progress on.

"We want to help Canadians… become greener. This current federal government has done nothing for the environment," Hall Findlay said.

"The Liberal [Green Shift] plan is the only one that will help to lower income taxes," she added.

Hall Findlay also said the Liberals are supporters of Israel and would like to see a peaceful two-state solution to the Mideast conflict.

"We are very supportive of the Jewish community and of Israel," she said, adding it shouldn't be necessary to say that the Liberals stand behind Israel, but Harper has made it that way.

The Conservative candidate Karns, who could not be reached for comment, is running on a platform of further cuts to the GST and a tougher stand on crime, including minimum sentences for gun crime.

Wallace said her goal is to meet the needs of constituents by creating green jobs, putting a stop to further health care privatization and placing more emphasis on arts and culture.

"Artists should not be insulted or diminished," she said, referring to comments by Harper earlier in the campaign that complaints by artists "claiming their subsidies aren't high enough when they know those subsidies have actually gone up, I'm not sure that's something that resonates with ordinary people."

Carcasole's campaign for the Green party is focused mainly on climate change and health care, and more specifically on reinstating the single-tier system and stopping further privatization of health care.

Aside from considering the election unnecessary, Wallace and Hall Findlay both said they're unhappy with Harper's decision to hold the election on the first day of Sukkot.

"I hope they [the Jewish community] can find the means to vote," Wallace said, urging voters to check her website for information about advance polls.

"Thanks, Mr. Harper for checking a calendar," she added sarcastically.

Riding a study in contrasts

By LAURA STRICKER
Special to The CJN

The riding of Don Valley West can best be described as a study in contrasts.

On the one hand, there is the Bridle Path with its multimillion dollar mansions. At the other end of the spectrum is Flemingdon Park, where several families often live in one apartment.

"There are many different issues that face the people of Don Valley West, and I want to be a spokesperson for those issues at the federal level," he said.

Don Valley West is bounded by Highway 401 in the north and Millwood Road and the Don River in the south. Yonge Street, Broadway Avenue, Eglinton Avenue, Bayview Avenue and Moore Avenue make up the riding's western boundaries, and it's bounded by Don Mills Road, the east section of the Don River and the CN rail line in the east.

In 2006 the population was 117,083, an increase of 1.3 per cent since 2001. Approximately four per cent of the riding is Jewish.

The riding was scheduled for a by-election on Sept. 22 to choose a replacement for Liberal incumbent John Godfrey after he resigned in July. It was cancelled after the election was called. Running in Don Valley West along with Sparrow are John Carmichael for the Conservatives, Rob Oliphant for the Liberals, and Georgina Wilcock for the Green party.

Carmichael and Oliphant could not be reached for comment.

Sparrow's big issues include jobs – making sure immigrants work in the jobs they came to Canada for and making the minimum wage $10 an hour. As an actor and writer, he believes in the importance of arts and culture. The environment is also at the top of his agenda, as is helping young people so that they don't join gangs by the time they're 15.

"I'm a very staunch defender of the arts in all forms, and [Prime Minister] Stephen Harper's cuts are really reprehensible, because they're cuts to some of the smallest programs that do some of the best work in our country," he said.

Sparrow also spoke about his position on Israel.

"The NDP and myself believe that Israel has a right to exist, and also, frankly, that Palestine has a right to exist. I hope the two will be able to exist peacefully," he said.

"I think that peace in the Middle East is something we all need to support and strive for," he said.

Carmichael lists on his website the environment, crime and child care as his major campaign issues. Specific plans include cutting air pollution in half by 2015, taking a tougher stand on crime and providing more support to families.

Oliphant and the Liberals plan to cut income taxes for both families and corporations, expand the Canada Child Tax Benefit and create more affordable housing and homelessness programs.

Wilcock and the Green party, meanwhile, are making the environment their number 1 priority. Plans include reducing Canada's dependency on fossil fuels and ensuring that Canada's water supply is managed in order to create healthy, sustainable communities.

Wilcock, a convert to Judaism, told The CJN that if elected, she would be a "strong and staunch defender of Israel."

She added that her party doesn't practise partisan politics, and that once in office, she would feel free to vote on matters "according to my conscience."

"I was proud of [Prime Minister] Stephen Harper's refusal to go to Durban II," Wilcock said.

Wilcock added that her campaign's main focus is on the environment and addressing the issues of pollution and "crumbling cities and infrastructure," which she said she hears about from constituents in her riding.

The Green party "has a plan to invest in cities," she said.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

אומרים שגם אהוד אולמרט הקפיד על נקיון וישרה בשנות היותו ראש ממשלה, אלא שהעבר שלו חזר והופיע ולא נתן לו מנוח. עושה רושם שצימוי לבני מתחילה מעמדה נוחה לפחות בעיניין זה.

"כמובן, הוא ענה בגאווה, מחזור 1965..."

"מה לימדת שם?..."

Candidates keep it civil at Beth Tzedec meeting

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Enjoined by Beth Tzedec Congregation's Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl to consider the venue and debate the issues with respect, candidates for the Toronto St. Paul's riding did just that.

Far from mind were the raucous scenes in question period, where politicians fling heated barbs back and forth. Approximately 125 people at the mid-town Toronto synagogue were treated to a tame exhibition of political discourse on Sept. 24, with the temperature ramping up only during a discussion of the Tories' anti-crime proposals that would allow youths as young as 14 to face adult consequences – including life in prison – for serious violent crimes while having their identities revealed.

Incumbent Liberal MP Carolyn Bennett reached unexpected heights of oratorical opulence when she called Prime Minister Stephen Harper's proposals "crazy stuff" and an example of "ridiculosity."

Tory challenger Heather Jewell stumbled briefly when she suggested young offenders even under the Conservatives' plan could still be rehabilitated in prison – that after Bennett had called teens in prison the equivalent of "crime school" and Jewell herself questioned whether much rehabilitation took place there.

"Seventy per cent of young offenders have learning disabilities," Bennett stated. "They [the Tories] can have their crimes stuff. I want a safer society."

Jewell, a political activist who describes herself as a businesswoman, stated the goal of the crime proposals was "to protect society, and that may mean knowing the names of kids who are really whacked out."

Jailing youngsters for serious crimes "means a lot to [victims of crime]. You left wingers may laugh. It's about protecting society. It's not just about rehabilitation."

Jewell's tough on crime approach got unexpected support from NDP candidate Anita Agrawal, a manager in her family's Toronto-based accessories manufacturing and exporting business, who said her party is tough on crime, but also "tougher on the reasons for crime."

On support for Israel, Bennett and Jewell vied to see who was stronger. Jewell said she was "proud to be Canadian when Stephen Harper stood up in the international stage and led" during Israel's 2006 war with Hezbollah.

She cited Canada's record under Harper of changing its votes at the United Nations to favour Israel after the previous Liberal governments had voted against the Jewish state 79 times. She called Israel a shining example of democracy in the Middle East, adding "we have to be there for them because they are on the front line for us."

Bennett pointed out Canada's UN voting began to shift under former Liberal prime minister Paul Martin and that the Tories only maintained that same pace of change. Faced with a question about high-profile Liberal Michael Ignatieff, who called an Israeli bombing attack in Lebanon a war crime, Bennett noted he had issued "a profound apology" for the statement. She suggested he had spoken before knowing all the facts.

Bennett shifted to her own experience in Israel, saying she had visited the country seven times. She said she has been to Metulla, on Israel's border with Lebanon, where you could "see rockets coming." She said Canada could play a role as a go-between with Syria and she defended Israel's right to defend itself against rocket attacks.

"Canada needs to stand up to the plate and stand up for that gem that sits in the middle of the chaos," she said.

Erdman, who visited the Jewish state on a Birthright Israel trip, said it was important to recognize there are two sides to any conflict. It is not productive to say that only one side bears responsibility. "Unwavering support completely ignores the needs of the other side, and that's no way to come to a conclusion," he said.

Agrawal said Israel's security barrier was working "for the time being," but was only a short term measure. As for Iran, she said diplomacy is working and it's important to talk to all sides.

Asked during a question period whether Canada's decision not to attend next year's followup to the 2001 UN anti-racism conference was too one-sided in favour of Israel, Jewell said, "How can you not take a position for the rule of law?... I don't call it one-sided to stand up for the rule of law and democracy. That's all we've got."

Agrawal said the NDP favoured Canadian participation in the conference.

"Things are not as black and white as the Conservatives would like us to believe," she said.

The candidates sparred again on the environment, with Erdman saying the Greens favoured a carbon tax on polluters, believing it "a relatively neutral proposition" if other taxes are lowered.

Bennet said the Liberals proposed a carbon tax coupled with reduced income taxes.

Agrawal said given "the economic downturn, now is not the time to play around with risky propositions." She called for investment in "green collar," environmentally friendly jobs.

Jewell said the Tories' GST cut and the ability to steer clear of a recession has left Canadians able to absorb the shock of higher energy prices.

Liberal leader Stephane Dion's proposed carbon tax would hurt average income families. "Now is not the time," she said.

Economic issues resonate in Eglinton-Lawrence

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Joe Volpe, the Liberal incumbent for Toronto's Eglinton-Lawrence riding, says the economy is a "major, major issue" in the upcoming federal election.

"We believe the government has to intervene to ensure the Canadian population is protected in times of downturn, and to look ahead," he said.

Volpe has served the riding since 1988 and is a former federal minister of citizenship and immigration, as well as a former minister of human resources and skills development.

Eglinton-Lawrence has a population of just over 110,000, including a sizeable Orthodox community in the Bathurst Street-Lawrence Avenue area. It is bounded by Highway 401, Eglinton Avenue West, Yonge Street and the CN line west of Caledonia Road. Average family income in the riding is $162,855, and there is an unemployment rate of 5.6 per cent.

For many constituents, the date of the election on Oct. 14, the first day of Sukkot, has emerged as a "troubling" issue, Volpe said.

However, Oliver noted in a separate interview, "there have never been more opportunities to vote" before the actual election day.

He said the timing of the election "resulted from a combination of circumstances that really tied [Prime Minister Stephen Harper's] hands."

Volpe said health care is also a significant issue because of an aging population, increased lifespans, a shortage of health care professionals, and an overall decrease in the number of children per family.

Of particular interest to Jewish voters, Volpe said that his position on Israel has been "to be a vigorous defender and promoter not just of Israel, but of what Israel represents to the Jewish Diaspora."

Regarding funding for the Palestinian Authority, Volpe said that the Liberals, like the current Conservative government, will provide assistance for overseas development "in order to create civil societies, an appreciation for the rule of law and democratic governments."

He added that funding to provide security for Jewish and ethnic communities is "part and parcel of… a [Liberal] strategy to help all vulnerable groups." He said the Liberals "would always improve" on the present government's $3-million Security Infrastructure Program.

Oliver – who received his MBA from Harvard University in 1970 and was president and chief executive officer of the Investment Dealers Association from 1995 to 2007 – noted that economic issues "are resonating quite a bit more" since he starting campaigning almost 18 months ago. He said that, under the Conservative government, the average family's tax burden has been reduced by $3,500, and there have been tax breaks for seniors and young families.

Other issues that Oliver considers significant include crime – particularly gun crime – and the environment. Among other initiatives, the Tories want to cut air pollution in half by 2015, he said.

Safeguards when it comes to funding the Palestinian Authority are "crucial," Oliver said. "The Canadian position is to foster peace in the Middle East [and elsewhere], and not to make naive decisions which will exacerbate the problem."

Riding held by Joe Volpe since 1988

He noted that Harper "has stood with Israel in times of great peril, when it mattered, and often alone."

Oliver believes that Toronto needs "a strong voice in the Conservative government. There are no Conservative MPs [from Toronto] at the moment."

Chatwin – a former actor who is completing his undergraduate specialist degree in political science and English at the University of Toronto – said he is in favour of security funding for ethnic and Jewish communities.

Regarding policy on Israel, he said that he is "coming into the riding to facilitate dialogue and build bridges," and that government decisions need to be "in the best interest of the safety of Canadians and the safety of Israel."

He said that there must be "clear safeguards" in place when funding the Palestinian Authority so that taxpayers' money will be spent "in the best interests of our country and our allies," referring in part to Israel.

He added that Canada can play "an important friendship role" in negotiations.

Chatwin, 33, said the economy and the "rising tide of gun crime" are serious concerns. Health care is also "an issue that can't be ignored any longer," he said.

"I would advocate training 12,000 new doctors and 6,000 nurses a year," said Chatwin, whose mother is a nurse.

James, the Green candidate, said that "something has to be done to discourage people from using carbon-producing emissions."

A 49-year-old lawyer by training, James said he believes, based on independent reports, that the world must impose a $50-a-tonne carbon tax, an amount that he said would work out to 12 or 13 cents per litre of gas and is five times the amount that would be imposed by the Conservatives initially.

He said that "what gets lost in the gloom and doom" surrounding global warming is that the situation provides "the greatest opportunity for job-producing activities. The transition to a low-carbon economy will create wealth and productivity on a level with computers and the Internet 25 years ago."

However, he warned, it will only happen if steps are taken to reduce carbon levels now.

The Green party's approach to health care, which he said has "not really been an issue" in this campaign, begins with reducing toxins in the air and in food that lead to disease, James said. Discouraging car use and encouraging walking and the use of public transit are also part of the plan.

There's "no question" that the Green party is a friend of Israel, he said. "We share common liberal democratic values… We acknowledge Israel's right to defend itself."

He said any funding to the Palestinian Authority "would have to be contingent upon not only denouncing terrorism, but taking active steps to prevent terrorism."

Peace deal by year's end thought unlikely

Israeli and Palestinian leaders have expressed doubts they could meet Washington's goal of reaching a peace deal by the end of the year, before U.S. President George W. Bush leaves office.

"We see that the next months are maintaining a level of uncertainty and that level of uncertainty is getting higher and higher," Malki said in his English-language address to the forum in Jerusalem.

"We are waiting to see who will be the next president, [Barack] Obama versus [John] McCain, and believe me there is a big difference between the two vis-a-vis the situation in the Middle East... the Middle East peace process and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict," Malki said.

He did not elaborate on the Palestinian view of the Democratic and Republican presidential candidates.

Livni was asked by President Shimon Peres on Sept. 22 to form a government in 42 days following Olmert's resignation, under a cloud of corruption allegations.

"We hope that [Livni] will succeed [in forming a new government] because this will also show continuity and commitment to the peace process, and to the negotiations [for] a Palestinian state," Malki said.

Commenting on a key issue that has blocked progress in Israeli-Palestinian peace negotiations, Malki described Israel's settlement activity in the West Bank as a "time bomb."

Palestinian Authority committed to the talks

But he said the Palestinian Authority remained committed to the talks as a "strategic choice" and to pursuing an "internal dialogue" to reconcile with Hamas Islamists who seized control of the Gaza Strip in June 2007.

Because of the sensitive coalition negotiations with the religious Shas party, Livni will avoid making any declarations about Jerusalem or future concessions to the Palestinians.

The main goal of Livni and Foreign Ministry Director General Aaron Abramovich at the conference is to advance their quest to raise the status of the ministry vis-a-vis military intelligence, the Shin Bet security service, the Mossad and the Defence Ministry with regard to making military and foreign policy decisions. Senior Foreign Ministry officials said the idea was to end the military establishment's near monopoly on drafting recommendations for the cabinet and the security cabinet.

Attending the conference's opening session were past and present foreign ministers, including France's Kouchner and former German foreign minister Joschka Fischer.

Also in attendance were the director general of Singapore's foreign ministry; the new U.S. ambassador to Israel, James Cunningham; members of the Knesset's foreign affairs and defence committee; and 13 senior Israeli ambassadors serving abroad.

The three-day conference is the culmination of three months of work in the Foreign Ministry to prepare the first annual foreign policy assessment. The goal is to hammer out an assessment similar in style to those produced by the ministry's counterparts in Britain, France and the United States.

After the conference sessions, a written foreign policy assessment will be assembled and its recommendations will be submitted to the security cabinet for approval. The recommendations are to become part of the Foreign Ministry's agenda and are expected to affect staffing at Israel's diplomatic representations abroad.

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Pages from an Israeli astronaut's diary that survived the explosion of the space shuttle Columbia and a 37-mile fall to Earth went on display last weekend for the first time in Jerusalem.

The diary belonged to Ilan Ramon, Israel's first astronaut and one of seven crew members killed when Columbia disintegrated upon re-entering the atmosphere on Feb. 1, 2003. Part of the restored diary went on display at the Israel Museum on Sunday.

A little more than two months after the shuttle explosion, NASA searchers found 37 pages from Ramon's diary, wet and crumpled, in a field just outside the U.S. town of Palestine, Texas. The diary survived extreme heat in the explosion, then extreme atmospheric cold, and was subsequently attacked by microorganisms and insects in the field where it fell, said museum curator Yigal Zalmona.

"It's almost a miracle that it survived. It's incredible," Zalmona said.

"There is no rational explanation for how it was recovered when most of the shuttle was not."

NASA returned the diary to Ramon's wife, Rona, who brought it to forensics experts at the Israel Museum and the Israeli police. The diary took about a year to restore, Zalmona said, and it took police scientists about four more years to decipher the pages.

Ilan Ramon

About 80 per cent of the text has been deciphered, while the rest remains unreadable, he said.

Two pages will be displayed. One contains notes written by Ramon, and the other is a copy of the Kiddush prayer, the blessing over wine recited on Shabbat. Zalmona said Ramon copied the prayer into his diary so he could recite it on the shuttle and have the blessing broadcast to Earth.

"Most of the pages contain personal information which Ramon's wife did not wish to make public," he said.

"We agreed to do the restoration completely respecting the family's privacy and the sensitivity about how intimate the document is," museum director James Snyder said.

The diary provides no indication that Ramon knew anything about potential problems on the shuttle. Columbia's wing was gashed by a chunk of fuel tank foam insulation at liftoff. The spacecraft broke up in flames just 16 minutes before it was scheduled to land at the Kennedy Space Center in Florida. All seven astronauts on board were killed.

The diary is being displayed as part of a larger exhibit of famous documents from Israel's history, held to mark the country's 60th anniversary this year.

Also on display will be Israel's 1948 Declaration of Independence, the 1994 peace treaty with Jordan, and a bloodstained sheet of paper with lyrics to a peace anthem that was carried by prime minister Yitzhak Rabin at the time of his assassination in 1995.

Israel Briefs

Death rhetoric from Iran

"Today, officials of the Zionist regime acknowledge that they are moving toward weakness, destruction and defeat," Ayatollah Ali Khameini said in remarks. "Definitely, the world of Islam will see that day and hope the existing generation of the Palestinian people will watch the day Palestine is at the disposal of the Palestinian people, in the hands of the landlords." Khameini also promised to stand by Hamas, the Palestinian terrorist group that controls Gaza. Israel's ambassador to the United States said that Khameini's rhetoric was especially dangerous as Iran nears its suspected goal of obtaining a nuclear weapon. "Not since World War II has the world faced such a dangerous and significant threat," Sallai Meridor said in a statement. "The fanatical Iranian regime, a sponsor of global terror, is threatening the elimination of another state and is striving to achieve a nuclear weapon. This should be a moment of truth for the world to take immediate actions to prevent this regime from pursuing the development of a military nuclear capability."

Hezbollah threatens north

Hezbollah warned that it will "soon liberate" the Shebaa Farms and the divided village of Ghajar, Lebanon's Daily Star reported last Friday. Sheikh Nabil Qaouk, Hezbollah's leader in southern Lebanon, told supporters in the border village of Abbasieh that diplomacy over the areas had failed and the only way to regain control of the land was to use force, according to the report. "The only guaranteed way to recover the remaining occupied land is the resistance and nothing else," Qaouk said. He added that it was Hezbollah's national duty to fulfil the achievements it had begun with the Israel Defense Forces' withdrawal from Lebanon in 2000, according to the report.

Terrorism not an 'act of war'

Israeli media reported that a U.S. judge allowed a lawsuit against the PLO to go forward, saying acts of terror cannot be defined as "acts of war."

Judge George Daniels of the Manhattan District Court dismissed claims by lawyers for the Palestine Liberation Organization that attacks committed between 2001 and 2004 were "acts of war" and immune from tort action. The ruling will allow a $3-billion lawsuit filed by victims and their families to go to trial. Daniels wrote in his ruling that the attacks targeted "non-combative civilians who were allegedly simply going about their everyday lives" and "do not constitute acts of war." At least 33 people were killed in the attacks at a Hebrew University cafeteria, on Jerusalem streets and on buses. The attacks suggested a "merciless capability of indiscriminately killing and maiming untold numbers in heavily populated civilian areas," Daniels wrote.

Probe into al-Dura case

Israeli media reported that a new French committee will investigate the death of the Palestinian boy, Mohammed al-Dura, who, according to a French television report, was killed by Israel Defence Forces gunfire on Sept. 30, 2000, the first day of the second intifadah. The committee, set up by the French public broadcasting authority, will examine the validity of the original television report in light of repeated accusations that it was deliberately falsified.

Destination Israel: China launches official tours

By ALISON KLAYMAN
JTA

BEIJING — At a pre-departure session for China's first tour group to Israel, manager Wu Jianguo from China Travel Service answered many questions from his pioneering clients: will all the shops be closed on the day of rest? Are there Chinese restaurants in Israel?

Where can we buy a menorah? Should we not bring any snacks with pork?

The trips are the first fruits of an agreement signed last October by Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni and then-Chinese Foreign Minister Yang Jiechi that landed Israel on the list of more than 100 countries to have China's "approved destination status."

This designation makes it easier for Chinese tourists to travel to Israel, and Israel is hoping this will ultimately lead to a tourism boom. Now the Chinese domestic market for Israel travel is mostly businesspeople, about half of whom make up government delegations, according to El Al's sales manager for China, Helen Huang.

El Al started its Beijing-Tel Aviv route in 1992 and now has three weekly flights, along with five weekly flights to Hong Kong.

"Now we are thinking of adding a fourth flight to Beijing or upgrading to a 777 for that route," Huang said. "We might also think about adding service to Shanghai."

Most of the traffic goes in the other direction, with about 50,000 Israeli visitors to China each year.

Two major Chinese travel companies, China Travel Service and China Youth Travel Service, worked with six approved Israeli agencies to plan a 10-day tour of Israel and Jordan scheduled to coincide with China's Oct. 1 national holiday marking the republic's founding in 1949.

> Israel is hoping this will ultimately lead to a tourism boom

Before the agreement went into effect Sept. 15, the companies could not publicly advertise travel to Israel.

The agreement is "another demonstration of Israel and China's good relations," said Guy Kivetz, an Israeli Embassy spokesperson.

Some of the travellers were unaware they were making history.

"My wife and I didn't know until a few days ago this was the first group," 30-year-old Church Moore (surnamed Mao in Chinese) told JTA as he was checking in Sept. 25 at Beijing Capital Airport. "We have always wanted to go to Israel because we love reading about Jewish history and culture."

Many group members are older world travellers who regularly patronize one of the two agencies. The Wangs, who declined to give their first names, are in their 50s and have been to other approved Middle Eastern countries, such as Egypt and Turkey, and travelled to the United States and Europe.

They inquired at the youth travel agency about new opportunities and jumped at the chance to visit Israel.

"Israel is a very mysterious place," Mrs. Wang said. "Also, Israelis are very smart and have persevered through many instances of persecution."

"Jerusalem, the Dead Sea – we know these places better than we know the names of some countries," Mr. Wang added.

Nearly all of the tourists mention the word "mysterious" in describing Israel's appeal, but another major attraction is Christianity's roots in the country.

At his information session for travellers, Wu pointed out the New Testament connections to the itinerary, and many tourists asked about going to Bethlehem. Asked if they were Christian, all but one raised their hands.

Most analysts say that approximately 80 million Christians live in China, while the government puts the figure at 16 million.

Promoting Israel during an interview with Sohu.com, China's biggest Internet company, Wu described Israel as a place where "you can have a map in your right hand and a Bible in your left hand and find your way around."

While intrigue and Christianity are Israel's major draws for Chinese tourism, it is difficult to find Mandarin-speaking tour guides. Also, the price is high: including visa and airfare, the total per person is 21,800 renminbi, or more than $3,000 (US).

"At that cost you could go to Europe or the United States," said El Al's Huang, which is why she advocates quality over quantity in the inaugural years. "We want to slowly increase the number of Chinese tourists coming to Israel, not double or triple the amount every month. The early groups need to encourage the next wave of travellers to choose Israel."

A representative of Israel's Ministry of Tourism was quoted in Ha'aretz as saying that Israel's goal was to bring in 15,000 Chinese tourists by the end of 2008. Observers here, however, said that figure was unlikely.

Israeli Tourism Minister Ruhama Avraham-Balila was in Beijing for the Paralympic Games and talked about a more long-term vision in which "one-half of one per cent of the Chinese population visits Israel."

That's about 6.6 million people.

Filmmaker examines a hyper-accelerated, post-modern relationship

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Who knew that the countless sleepless nights Jeffrey Nesker spent in nightclubs in downtown Toronto would be the fodder for his most successful film to date?

Pairing his club culture expertise with his active imagination and talent for storytelling, Nesker wrote and directed Nightclub Story, a short film that is garnering attention and awards from film festivals in Canada and abroad.

"Nightclub Story to me is first and foremost an examination – I've always been fascinated by the rules of polite society, the fact that if there were no manners, we'd kill each other over a parking spot," said 30-year-old Nesker, a graduate of York University's department of film and video who has been producing low-budget short films and music videos through his production company Ocular Nutrition since 2000.

"I always thought it's ridiculous that people go to nightclubs to meet people, but it's the most loud, abrasive – it's the opposite of what you would want, ideally, to do that sort of thing."

He explained that his 17-minute short film is "about the disconnect between what we want and what we need, between who we are and who we think we are."

The protagonists, James, 26, and Annie, 21, meet while waiting in line to get into a club. James, who seems to have outgrown the club scene, is meeting up with his friends after a rough day at work, and Annie is, as Nesker describes her, a girl with "wide eyes who is just coming into her sexual understanding of herself and using it almost to a fault as a bargaining chip in all of her dealings."

In the short time they spend in line together, "they share a hyper-accelerated, ridiculously post-modern relationship, from stolen glances to looks of disgust."

Nesker said that the concept for this film was born eight years ago, when he was still in film school.

"Then it was called Subway Story, and it all took place on a subway... I always loved the gimmick of it and the idea of the hyper-accelerated relationship in an enclosed setting," he said.

"As I got closer and closer to being able to make a short film last year and I started pouring out ideas... I thought to myself, a really good short film is never too big for its breeches. It's got to be a one-trick pony, and it's got to be well executed."

After making some revisions in the script, mainly changing the setting from a subway train to nightclub queue, Nesker said he was thrilled with the final product and is floored by the response the film has gotten from his film festival peers.

Nightclub Story had its première in August at the Rhode Island International Film Festival. His film was accepted into the WILDsound Shorts Festival later that month, at which it tied with another short film for best overall performances.

In September, Nesker travelled to Glasgow for the Bootleg Film Festival, at which he was declared best director for a short film. The film was also given an honourable mention at the Accolade Film Awards in Los Angeles.

Nesker guessed that the film resonates with so many people because the element of fantasy depicted in the film is a major part of the club experience, regardless of the generation depicted.

"I think that people go to nightclubs for the expectation of that cinematic rush of romance that will make everything better, or that will change everything in an instant," he said.

"I notice that especially with my own peers that people were going to nightclubs well past their 'sell-by' date because they couldn't give up on the fantasy. If they did, it would mean that they were settling for the mundane existence that defines what we perceive as adulthood and a lot of people – I think I did, too – struggled with that, and I wanted to dramatize it."

Nesker said that while its important to draw from his experience, he realizes that if a script doesn't measure up in terms of the rules of structure, good drama and balanced portrayals, it'll end up becoming an exercise in self-indulgence.

"It can't just be about you, it has to be universal."

Coming from a suburban Jewish family, raised by his father who is a lawyer and his mother who is a teacher, he found it hard to decide if he was going to take the road less travelled and pursue a film career, or take the safe route by getting a secure desk job.

Nightclub Story* director Jeffrey Nesker, and production designer Meredith Woodley on set.

Saffron Cassaday played "Annie" who is "just coming into her sexual understanding of herself and using it almost to a fault."

"I put enormous pressure on myself, and there isn't a day that goes by when I don't consider quitting it all to drive a bus, or go to law school, to make my parents at least a modicum happier," he said.

"But to be fair, I've always been artistic and I clued in pretty early. I saw Jaws and Poltergeist when I was five, and that's why I wanted to be filmmaker. Despite it being a nice little story to toss off, there is some truth there. I can remember being terribly affected by film at a very early age, and I knew that it was something I wanted to do."

Although Nesker is working to fulfil his dream of being a successful filmmaker, he knows that it'll never be easy.

"People in my industry are always patting themselves on the back and saying, 'Isn't it great that we escaped that dreary nine-to-five existence?' And they say it with such contempt. You have to look at them and say, 'What did we escape?' We're up at the crack of dawn and in bed like 12 to 18 hours later, just to do it again the next day. We didn't escape much."

And the work doesn't end when the final edits are made. Nesker is currently busy promoting and entering his film into various film festivals.

On Nov 5, Nightclub Story will be screened at the Bloor Cinema in Toronto for the opening night gala and best short film showcase of the Moving Image Film Festival.

He said he also plans to enter the film into the Toronto Jewish Film Festival in 2009, four years after another of his films, Florida: A Snowbird's Paradise? was accepted into the festival.

He said although there is nothing in Nightclub Story that is specifically Jewish, Nesker said that there is a Jewish sensibility to it.

"There is a bratty questioning that I think is very Jewish, like an entitled questioning of society... I think it has Jewish content because I can't escape who I am," he said.

"For me to ignore it or not claim it would be stupid. We are a collection of our experience and I regret nothing."

Nesker is working on his next film, Apocalypse Story.

Towering over the country western scene

By RUTH ELLEN GRUBER
JTA

CRAPONNE SUR ARZON, France — Think Jews and country music and you'll probably come up with Kinky Friedman, the cigar-chomping frontman of the iconoclastic Texas Jewboys, who is also a humourist, mystery novelist and failed but flamboyant candidate for Texas governor.

The real Jewish king of country music, however, is Ray Benson, the nine-time Grammy-winning leader of the country western swing band Asleep at the Wheel.

At 6 ft.-7 inches., Ray Benson has been described as a "Jewish giant" and "the biggest Jew in country."

He literally and figuratively towers over the stage in a Stetson and fancy boots, with a grizzled beard and long, thinning hair pulled back in a pony tail.

"I saw miles and miles of Texas, all the stars up in the sky," he sings in his deep, mellow baritone. "I saw miles and miles of Texas, gonna live here 'til I die."

Now 57, Benson was born in Philadelphia but has lived in Austin for 35 years. He talks with a twang, plays golf with Willie Nelson, has recorded more than 30 albums and was named Texas Musician of the Year in 2004.

By his own estimate, he is the only Jewish singing star in the country western scene.

"Kinky's not a country western singer – he's Kinky!" Benson laughed during a conversation with JTA this summer at the annual Country Rendez-vous festival in south-central France, where Asleep at the Wheel wound up a five-nation European tour.

Unlike Friedman, however, who makes playing with stereotypes part of his in-your-face persona, Benson has – until now – kept his religious identity out of the limelight.

"I didn't want to be known as a Jewish country western singer; I wanted to be known as a country western singer who happens to be Jewish," he said.

"You don't usually tell your religion or politics on stage," he added. "For years, because

Ray Benson

I'm 6 ft.-7 and people don't think Jews are tall, and because I guess I don't look like the stereotype Jew, most people didn't know I'm Jewish."

Benson got his musical start as a child in suburban Philadelphia, where he grew up in a Reform Jewish home. He and his sister put together a folk group, and he was only 11 when he played his first professional gig.

"In those days, if you're a Jewish kid, you go to school, you go to college or you enter your parents' business," Benson said. "So, I obviously chose a different path."

Benson founded Asleep at the Wheel in 1970 along with several friends, including his former Philadelphia schoolmate Lucky Oceans, a pedal steel guitar player born Ruben Gosfield, who now lives in Australia.

The band based itself in West Virginia and California before moving to Austin in 1973. Over the decades, Benson has remained the anchor of the group, while some 90 musicians have moved in and out of its lineup.

On the road much of the year, the band has criss-crossed America, playing everywhere from down-home dance halls to the White House – they were, in fact, scheduled to perform there on Sept. 11, 2001.

Asleep at the Wheel has played at inauguration parties for presidents Bush and Clinton and expect to play for whomever is elected in November. Earlier this year, they played at an Austin fundraiser for Barack Obama where the Democratic presidential nominee joined them onstage for a chorus.

When the band first started touring in the '70s, Benson recalled, country music was a "southern, conservative, Christian, white domain – period." He repeatedly came up against offhand prejudice and ignorance about Jews and Judaism.

He cites as an example a member of Tammy Wynette's entourage, who blamed "the Jews in New York" for failing to promote her career, and had a hard time believing Benson when he told him he was Jewish. Then there's the wife of a musician who had never heard of Judaism as a religion.

"I asked her what she thought a Jew was, and she said, 'Someone who's cheap,'" Benson recalled.

"So the stereotypes are there, and they're still there," he said.

"I always felt myself to be an ambassador," he added. "I'm not a great practicing Jew on a daily basis, but I'm Jewish. And so I try to bring to them that we're just people."

Recently, Benson started doing this publicly, making explicit reference to his Jewish identity on stage.

The revelation comes as part of A Ride With Bob, a musical that Benson co-wrote, based on the life of Benson's musical hero, the Western Swing pioneer Bob Wills, who died in 1975.

Benson stars in the play, along with members of Asleep at the Wheel. Since its premiere in 2005, it has played to audiences all over Texas and elsewhere, including a sell-out performance at the Kennedy Center in Washington.

The premise is an imagined conversation between Benson and Wills. In it, Wills asks Benson how "a Jewish boy from Philadelphia" can play western swing music. Benson responds: "The same way that a white, hayseed hillbilly from the West Texas panhandle" can play, as Wills did, blues and jazz.

"Basically in this play I confront the issue, and I let the cat out of the bag – hey, I'm Jewish and happen to be the leader of the 'modern kings of western swing,'" Benson said.

"In the context of the play I was able to reveal this and also give it context," he added.

The point he wanted to make, he said, is that it doesn't matter where you come from or what your religion or background is in terms of music, art or other creative endeavors. What's important, he said, "is what's in your heart or what's in your mind or what's in your talent."

Names in the News: Daniela Gesundheit, a singer-songwriter, poet and cantor who was raised in Los Angeles, is the cantorial soloist at Toronto's Shir Libeynu congregation for the current High Holidays. Gesundheit has spent the past year shuttling between San Francisco and Toronto, and plans to settle here permanently in the spring.

Part of a new wave of musicians with impeccable Jewish education and cantorial training, Gesundheit's professional experience and style "are a perfect fit for our liberal and innovative services," said Aviva Goldberg, Shir Libeynu's co-founder and ritual director.

Gesundheit seems equally delighted at taking the cantorial role at the unaffiliated, inclusive and egalitarian downtown congregation, which holds monthly Shabbat services at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre. "Being a chazzan is kind of like singing to an usually focused and quiet audience that knows all of my songs – a rare scenario in bars or clubs," she said. www.shirlibeynu.ca

Singer fuses Yemenite sounds and jazz

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Special to the CJN

Award-winning Israeli singer-songwriter Michal Cohen is recognized for the unique way in which she fuses the ancient sounds of her Yemenite heritage with contemporary jazz.

Cohen's soaring vocals and soulful compositions opened this year's Richardson Partners Financial Israeli Concert Series at the Rady Jewish Community Centre in Winnipeg recently.

Cohen, accompanied by local musicians, performed songs from her critically acclaimed debut CD, Henna, which she has been showcasing in North America and internationally since its release in early 2004.

Cohen says that her band Henna Project originally blended ancient Yemenite melodies with modern electronic beats, but after becoming involved in the New York jazz scene the band absorbed the jazz influence to create a sound she calls "henna jazz."

She explains how she chose the word "henna" to describe her music. "As a child [born in Israel to Yemenite parents] I lived in the Yemenite town of Rosh HaAyin. I remember going to henna parties, which are traditional Yemenite wedding parties for women. At these parties, there were wonderful old ladies that used to sing and tap on big cans used for storing pickles. They would remove the pickles and make this emotional and happy music," Cohen says.

"Years later, when I started with the Henna Project, I asked my mother to take me again to a henna party, so that I could remember everything about them."

According to Cohen, in Yemen, Jewish women were not allowed to sing in Hebrew, as it was "sacred language" and instead they "wrote music in Arabic Yemenite." She says, "This music was mostly about love that's happening or happened or that is forbidden. I remember my mother singing and humming all the time while she cooked. As a child I heard this and that ethnic music influenced me."

Cohen, who performed as a lead singer in an army band during her military service in Israel, says that the Henna Project was born after her father died in 2000. "His passing made me look back more into my tradition and that's how this project was born."

Michal Cohen

The song that is most dear to Cohen's heart, which she performed in Winnipeg, is titled Aluva. It is "a song about my father and my brother, both who passed away," she says. "It's very emotional and sad, but it has an optimistic side. It's about the worth of living your life [fully], rather than just floating through it."

As a child, Cohen says she sang every kind of music that she heard. "I never thought that singing would be a profession for me… But I listened to all kinds of music," she says

After receiving a scholarship to the Berkley College of Music in Boston, from which she graduated in 2000, Cohen remained in the United States until 2006, when she returned home to Israel.

"Going to the United States is tricky. Once I finished studying, I began to feel out the music scene. You get caught up, because there are so many things going on in New York where I moved to. So I stayed and stayed. At one point, I realized I would know when it was time to go back. And that's what happened.

"I am glad to be back. I am happy to be with my family, even though the music scene is a bit smaller in Israel than New York," says Cohen, who now lives near Tel Aviv.

Cohen has performed in Europe, Mexico, the Far East and in Canada at the Ottawa World Music Festival, as well as in the United States. Her vocals have been used for the soundtracks of two movies, Historias Minimas by Carlos Sorin and Divan by Pearl Gluck, and she has been featured on BBC London and PBS in the United States.

Cohen says that after a concert in Germany, " a woman told me that she could hear all of my cultural roots from my voice."

In Winnipeg, Cohen performed with Ted Poor, a drummer with whom she usually performs when she's in New York. She was accompanied by talented local musicians Myron Schultz on clarinet, Steve Kirby on bass and Will Boness on piano.

Cohen, who was a finalist in the John Lennon Songwriting Contest and has been the recipient of the Vocal Jazz Cleo Laine Award, says she is currently working on a new CD that "will be out in a few months.

"The new CD of my music is going to be electronic, but it will have all kinds of influences," she says.

Hamlisch and Spiro rock Beth Tzedec

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

British entertainer Cantor Simon Spiro and award-winning Broadway composer Marvin Hamlisch rocked a nearly sold-out crowd at Beth Tzedec Congregation last week.

The show Broadway & Beyond was part of the Beth Tzedec 2008 Musical Magic Concert Series that brought singer Neil Sedaka to Beth Tzedec last May.

Spiro, who arrived in Toronto two years ago to serve as Beth Tzedec's cantor, created the Musical Magic series. At the concert, he treated the audience to some of his favourite Broadway tunes, as well as pop songs from generations ago.

Hamlisch, one of the most celebrated composers and the winner of three Oscars, four Grammys, four Emmys, a Tony, three Golden Globes and a Pulitzer Prize for A Chorus Line, joined Spiro onstage halfway through the show to perform some of his famous compositions and to exchange witty banter.

At the start of the show, Hamlisch appeared in a pre-recorded message to say that he was happy to be performing with "one of the greatest, if not the greatest songwriter, entertainer, singer, cantor and true humanitarian."

He said he was honoured to be able to share the stage with " a giant of a human being."

Offering a taste of the shtick to come throughout the night, Hamlisch, who met Spiro years ago when they both performed for Queen Elizabeth II, asked, "Can I get my cheque now?"

Spiro, dubbed "the British Jazz Singer," has managed to balance careers as both a secular and religious entertainer.

He has performed with such legendary singers as Elton John, Sheena Easton, Eric Clapton, Shania Twain, Kenny Rogers, Cliff Richard, Phil Collins and Faith Hill, but he also fulfilled his parent's wishes and became a cantor when he was 18.

During the show, which included a 36-piece orchestra, Spiro shared anecdotes about his experiences and his family.

Growing up in London in a religious Jewish home, Spiro said he was heavily influenced by his father who was a performer in the Yiddish theatre of London's East End.

"My father played some of the most colourful characters in Yiddish theatre," he said.

Spiro said that since his father passed away eight years ago, there isn't a moment that he doesn't think of him.

"He was soft, he was gentle, he was my daddy."

He dedicated a song called Tatenyu to everyone in the audience who either has or is a father.

"It's about a young boy who thought his daddy was the moon and the sun and, of course, the boy grows up, has children of his own and in the autumn of his father's life sings this very beautiful song," he said.

Spiro became emotional during his performance, as pictures of his father and himself flashed behind him on a screen.

"I haven't sung that song in a long time. The last time I sang that song, he was in the audience," he said.

Spiro was joined intermittently by four young singers, Tammy Everett, Allie Hughes, Alex Samaras and Kyla Tingley, who sang a medley of Broadway tunes, including Tomorrow, Luck Be a Lady, and "Everything's Coming Up Roses."

Then Hamlisch, who has composed more than 40 motion picture scores, including The Way We Were and eight musicals including They're Playing Our Song, joined Spiro on stage and the two played off each other, eliciting laughter from the audience.

"I've been backstage and you've been playing every song ever written for Broadway – I didn't hear one of my tunes. So I'm here to change that," Hamlisch said.

He added that he's won and lost many awards, but sometimes the songs that have lost become more popular than those that won.

At the piano, he played a medley of his "Academy Award losers," including Nobody Does It Better, which was nominated for an Oscar in 1978 for best original song for the film The Spy Who Loved Me.

"I wrote the song, and then I had to take it to Carly Simon because we wanted her to do the song and she was married to James Taylor," Hamlisch shared.

"They're not married anymore – and James was not home that night," he said, getting laughs.

"The name of the song was Nobody Does It Better, and I told her it was autobiographical."

Other highlights from the evening included Hamlisch playing Happy Birthday on the piano, as he imagined Mozart and Beethoven would have performed it, and Spiro's tribute to Andrew Lloyd Webber's Phantom of the Opera.

Here's a sunny "Shalom" from Israel's first family of surfing, Amnour Kanzapolski, shown here with two of his children on the beach at Tel Aviv, a city which celebrates its 100th Anniversary in 2009. Behind him is the 4,000-year-old city of Jaffa where it is said Jonah met a whale. Amnour is the son of Shamai "Topsi" Kanzapolski who brought surfing to Israel in the 60's. He is a professional surfing instructor and part of his family's surfboard industry in Tel Aviv. His goal: to make sure the beaches of Israel are always clean and beautiful, the water free of pollution, and that you're always welcome to swim, surf and have a glorious time on the beaches of Israel.

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

When Erah Bester moved to Montreal in 2004, he wanted to find a way to counter the anti-Israel bias of the media.

"I was shocked by the image of Israel portrayed in the media," says the Tel Aviv-based businessman. "As an Israeli, I wanted people to know that Israel is much more than a country of conflict."

Bester, who spent two years in Montreal, decided the best way to convey a more positive image of Israel was through the arts and so in 2005, he organized an Israeli film festival.

"If I could have brought in the philharmonic orchestra, I would have. But cinema was a more cost-effective and efficient way to give people exposure to Israeli culture."

The Montreal Israeli Film Festival, an annual event for the last four years, has been so successful – some 4,000 people attended in 2008 – Bester is launching a similar festival in Toronto this fall.

The inaugural Toronto Israeli Film Festival will run from Oct. 26 to 30 at Sheppard Grande Cinemas at 4861 Yonge St. The public will have the opportunity to see seven films – all are in Hebrew with English subtitles– over five evenings. Two different films will screen each night.

Bester said the recent crop of Israeli films has been very high quality. "The films are all very good and different from each other. I feel they are the pick of the crop of Israeli cinema."

He added that "the films are very innovative" and have been well received at international film festivals.

The Toronto Israeli Film Festival will include Beaufort, which was nominated for an Academy Award for best foreign film in 2008. The co-writer of Beaufort's screenplay, Ron Leshem, will be in Toronto for the festival.

"I am very excited to be hosting this talented writer and filmmaker," Bester says.

The acclaimed film is a screen adaptation of Leshem's award-winning book of the same name, which garnered the 2006 Sapir Prize, Israel's top literary award. He will give a lecture and host a Q and A session at the 6:30 p.m. screenings of Beaufort on Oct. 26 and Oct. 29.

Noodle, the opening film of the festival – its first screening is 3:30 p.m. on Oct. 26 – is a fundraiser organized by Women in Motion. The proceeds will be going to the One Family Fund, an Israeli-based charity for victims of terror.

Bester says that he wanted one of the festival screenings to be a charitable event in support of an Israeli charity. "I am very happy that the fundraiser is for One Family. The organization really does excellent work."

Other films to be shown at the festival are Lost Islands, The Debt, Three Mothers, Lemon Tree and The Secrets.

Bester hopes the festival will attract unaffiliated Jews, whom, he says, are not well informed about Israel. He also wants to reach students and other young people.

There will be a free screening of Lost Islands on Oct. 25 for Taglit-Birthright Israel alumni. The screening is tentatively booked for 9 p.m. at the Regent Theatre at 551 Mount Pleasant Ave.

As well, if a film has not sold out and seats are available five minutes before the show, students with proper identification will get free admission.

The festival is a non-profit venture, which he describes as a "win-win situation" for the Toronto Jewish community and for Israel.

"This is a labour of love for me. At the end of the film, I'm standing at the exit to see how the film was received," he says.

"When people are excited about an Israeli film, I feel like the father of the bride. That is my reward."

For tickets, call 416-364-9973. Tickets are $13 each or $65 for all seven films. For festival updates, check www.israelfilmfestival.

The banana trade and Samuel Zemurray

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The banana, an exotic fruit generally grown in the tropics, was rarely available to North American and European consumers a century ago. Today, thanks to the United Fruit Company, the banana is one of the most popular and cheapest products found on supermarket shelves, having outstripped the apple as one of our favourite fruits.

Indeed, the banana, which is technically a plant rather than a tree, is now the world's fourth major food after rice, wheat and milk.

Apart from being delicious, the banana is good for your health, containing natural sugars (which boosts energy), potassium (which regulates blood sugar levels) and fibre (which assists bowel movements).

Bananas, such as those cultivated in Costa Rica from the 19th century on, brought wealth to the United Fruit Company, controlled by American Jewish immigrant Samuel Zemurray.

For much of the 20th century, the United Fruit Company – founded by a pair of Bostonians but later controlled by a Jewish immigrant from Russia named Samuel Zemurray – maintained a monopoly over the cultivation and distribution of bananas.

In 1969, eight years after Zemurray's death, the United Fruit Company was taken over by Eli Black, an investment banker and devout Jew who had been trained as a rabbi. In 1970, Black merged it with his own firm, AMK, and created the United Brands Company. Black committed suicide in 1975, jumping from the 44th floor of the Pan Am Building in Manhattan.

After his death, the billionaire investor Carl Lindner bought United Brands and renamed it Chiquita Brands International.

These are among the basic facts in Peter Chapman's intriguing history of the United Fruit Company, Jungle Capitalists: A Story of Globalization, Greed and Revolution (Canongate).

Chapman's book, as the title suggests, is more than an account of a multinational company that cleared rainforests and built railroads to ship its tantalizing products, mainly bananas and pineapples, to consumers.

With plantations throughout Latin America and the Caribbean, the United Fruit Company was a pioneer in mass production, a corporate behemoth that exerted enormous influence in such banana republics as Honduras, El Salvador, Panama and Costa Rica.

The first of the modern multinationals, it was a power onto itself, changing governments at the drop of a hat to suit its purposes.

As Chapman puts it, "United Fruit had possibly launched more exercises in 'regime change' on the banana's behalf than had even been carried out in the name of oil."

Nor was the United Fruit Company concerned about its legion of workers, denying them such basic human rights as decent wages and health care.

The company, whose impact on Latin America was incalculable, was established by an American railroad entrepreneur, Henry Meiggs, after he bought out businessman Andrew Preston. Meiggs' nephew, Minor Keith, subsequently took over the company.

Keith, knowing that bananas thrive in hot and damp conditions, realized that he should focus his energies in Central America.

There are more than 1,000 varieties of bananas, primarily in Africa and Asia, but the United Fruit Company settled on the Gros Michel, or Big Mike, variety. It was reasonably tasty and arrived at its destination with less bruising due to its thicker skin.

Big Mike, having succumbed to pests in the 1950s, was replaced by a disease-resistant Chinese variety, the Cavendish. According to the writer Dan Koeppel, the Cavendish is the food equivalent of a fast-food burger: efficient to produce, uniform in quality and universally affordable.

Regardless of the variety it marketed, the United Fruit Company was a going concern, effortlessly absorbing rivals.

In 1930, Zemurray, known to all as "Sam the Banana Man," sold his Cuyamel Fruit Company to the United Fruit Company and retired at the age of 52.

Born in Kishinev, Bessarabia, he immigrated to the United States with his impoverished parents as a teenager.

The family settled in Selma, Ala., but in 1899, Zemurray entered the fruit trade in Mobile, Ala., buying bruised bananas and selling them to second-hand dealers.

Within a few years, he moved to New Orleans, where he befriended Keith.

A canny operator, Zemurray flourished as he and a partner bought bananas from independent growers in Honduras and sold them in Alabama and Louisiana at a tidy profit.

In 1910, having purchased 5,000 acres of land in Honduras, he formed the Cuyamel Fruit Company.

Fearing that he would be taxed to death, he appealed to the U.S. State Department for help.

In a legendary manoeuvre, he hired two mercenaries and had them smuggle Bonilla back to Honduras. With Zemurray's financial support, Bonilla staged a coup d'etat and returned to office. Bonilla, indebted to Zemurray, granted him land concessions and waived his obligations to pay taxes for the next 25 years.

A multimillionaire, Zemurray returned to the banana business in 1933, seizing control of the United Fruit Company in a hostile takeover. The company's stock had dwindled in the face of mismanagement and the Depression, and Chapman describes these events at length. Zemurray ousted its board of directors, reorganized the company and made it profitable once again.

He let nothing stand in his way.

When the democratically elected president of Guatemala, Jacobo Arbenz, announced that he intended to transfer unused United Fruit Company's land to landless peasants in an agrarian reform project, he launched a propaganda campaign against Arbenz, branding him as a communist. Zemurray's tactic worked. The U.S. Central Intelligence Agency sponsored a successful coup against Arbenz.

Zemurray played a more benevolent role elsewhere, helping to fund the purchase of the Exodus for the Zionist movement, Chapman notes.

Today, with Zemurray long gone and the United Fruit Company but a hazy memory, four companies rather than one dominate the banana trade: Chiquita, Del Monte, Dole and Noboa.

One wonders what Zemurray would have thought of this development in the annals of capitalism.

A high-holiday lesson from Sandy Koufax

By TEDDY WEINBERGER
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Sandy Koufax was one of the greatest baseball pitchers of all time. He is also a secular Jew, born in 1935, who preferred not to work on the High Holidays.

Normally, Koufax exercised this religious preference without fanfare, as in Rosh Hashanah 1963, when he quietly returned to spend the holiday with his parents in Los Angeles while his team was on the road.

However in 1965, Koufax's team, the Los Angeles Dodgers, played the Minneapolis Twins in the World Series, and the first game was scheduled for the afternoon of Oct. 6, which also happened to be Yom Kippur.

As the team's best pitcher, Koufax was asked to pitch the first game. He refused. He informed the team's management that he did not pitch on Yom Kippur. That refusal turned out to be perhaps the single greatest moment of Kiddush Hashem (Sanctification of the Name) in American history, so much so that in the movie, The Big Lebowski, actor John Goodman could say, "Three thousand years of beautiful tradition, from Moses to Sandy Koufax."

Why did Koufax refuse to work on Yom Kippur? No one knows for sure. He never spoke about it. Asked about this matter in Sports Illustrated, Jane Leavy, who wrote a 2002 biography of Koufax, said: "I think it was reflex. Jews just don't work on Yom Kippur. It's the holiest holiday of the year, and whether you're practising/non-practising, observant/non-observant, devout/non-devout, you don't work on that day. For a more religious man, it might have been a no-brainer. For Koufax, it was the right thing to do."

I have been thinking about Koufax in connection with Israeli swimmer Alon Mandel's decision to remain at the Olympics even though his father had just died (Mandel was awoken early in Beijing the day before the Aug. 8 opening ceremonies and told that his father had died in an accident at the family home). Clearly, the 20-year-old Mandel had an extremely difficult decision to make, and I am sure he was right when he said his father would have wanted him to stay at the Olympics.

But I found it shocking that Israel turned Mandel into a media star. Yediot Achronot, Israel's largest circulation newspaper, spoke of Mandel in a large headline as "The First Hero of the Olympics." A popular Israeli sports internet site praised Mandel's "emotional strength" and a writer in Ha'aretz said: "His conduct since the tragedy and insistence on participating in the Olympics has been noble. He is a force of nature."

Oh, where are you now Sandy Koufax? Where are you to tell the Israeli people about doing the right thing? Where are you to tell the Israeli people that the right thing to do when one's father dies is to go home immediately and that the other option – having one's father placed in deep freeze for more than a week – constitutes disrespect for the dead.

Sandy, do we really need to spell out the reasons why this is the right thing? Do we really need to identify each step on the slippery slope once immediate burial is no longer sacrosanct? No Sandy, for the sake of Amir Lev we won't. You see, Sandy, Amir Lev is also a secular Jew who thinks the press used Mandel's story to sell papers and to boost ratings.

According to Amir, precisely because Mandel was representing Israel, where there is a culture of immediate burial soon after death, Mandel should have withdrawn from the Olympics and returned as soon as possible to Israel to bury his father.

So Sandy, in honour of the Jewish New Year, would it be OK to think that Amir is right?

Canadian teaches golf in Israel

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Special to The CJN

CAESAREA, Israel — When former Winnipegger Ron Solomon made aliyah to Israel two years ago, he never would have dreamed he could land a job that involved spending hours on a beautiful golf course every week.

"But that is exactly what happened," said Solomon, who has always loved the sport and is enjoying what he calls his "dream job" as a golf instructor at the Caesarea Golf Club.

The 57-year-old Solomon, who teaches golf to children ages eight to 17, worked in Winnipeg for 32 years as an elementary and junior high school teacher.

"I had never taught golf professionally," he said, "but I was always interested in it and studied it and loved to play. Many years ago, I taught a little golf at a community school level, in some after-school programs that had been put on by the school system in Winnipeg."

When Solomon, who speaks very little Hebrew, immigrated to Israel, he did not have a set idea about the line of work he would end up pursuing.

His wife, who was born and raised in Israel, was the driving force behind the move.

"My wife Michal had wanted to move to Israel for a number of years to be close to her large extended family," he said.

Solomon was willing to try making the move, but he was concerned because he knew very little Hebrew and worried it would be difficult to find suitable employment.

"My family and I moved to Kfar Yona, just outside of Netanya, because it was affordable and relatively near my wife's family in Kfar Saba," he said. "One day, I approached golf course professional Andy Santos at the Caesarea club and told him I had a teaching background and had always been interested in golf. It turned out the club needed an instructor for their junior program."

Ron Solomon

Solomon feels lucky he was in the right place at the right time. "Golf is starting to take off in Israel, and the country is trying to attract golf tourism," he said. Although Solomon said that "'speaking Hebrew would be a plus,'" virtually everyone he encounters on the golf course speaks English.

Solomon, who has always been a natural athlete, feels he also "got lucky" a second time when he was hired as a part-time soccer and basketball coach for children attending the Walworth Balbour American International School. The prestigious private school is located in Even Yehuda, not far from Kfar Yona, where Solomon lives.

"The American School is a great place to work, and the language of instruction is English, which makes it very easy for me. I love to teach sports, and between coaching and teaching golf, I'm having a great time. I never imagined finding work in Israel would have turned out to be so easy," he said.

Solomon believes there is going to be more and more demand for golf instruction in Israel. "The golf course in Caesarea is being completely rebuilt. The club has hired Pete Dye, a world renowned golf course designer, who has an excellent reputation for designing interesting and challenging courses.

"The new course will be world class. We'll be able to host international golf tournaments, which we haven't been able to do now.

"This will mean Israel will become a destination for golf tourists, both Jewish and non-Jewish, and the course should be open in time for the 18th Maccabiah Games in July 2009."

Baggage. Every day you collect a little bit more. Eventually, you collect enough that it makes you slow to move forward.

"Can't you just drop the baggage and run?" my friend asked me one day.

Sure, I can drop anything and run, but sometimes you just get tired of running, and when you slow down to take a breath, you realize that someone has taken the time to return the baggage you thought you left behind.

It's hard to know when it's right to move on after a hard breakup. Some people say the faster you can forget someone, the better.

People have different ways of dealing with relationships once they've ended. I've adopted a popular strategy – see no evil, feel no evil. After seven years of couplehood, I figured it was time for me to be my own girl instead of someone else's, and I relished in being as carefree as I wanted.

Hard, tough, jaded. I've been called it all, and it has all been well deserved.

The baggage was there, and I admit I never put it down for a second. Instead, I used it to shield myself from the crowds, occasionally using it to give a hard shove to those who thought they could get in my way.

Maybe I'll be able to move on when I meet someone who will shove me right back. Someone who is so preoccupied with their own baggage that they don't care to notice mine. Someone who doesn't try to get me to hold their hand instead of my baggage. Someone who doesn't expect me to reach out and take their baggage from them.

"You don't want someone with baggage," people have said.

Once upon a time, I would have dished out the same advice. Now I'm not so sure.

Would I trade my baggage? Never! I cherish all the lessons and experiences I've had in my 28 years, no matter how awkward or painful.

I'd like to think I've learned from my experiences and that they've made me who I am. That's also the "beauty" of baggage: it builds character. It allows us to look forward with confidence and lets us make decisions with distinction.

The danger is not in holding onto the baggage, but in turning it into one big clutch. It's so easy to use the past as an excuse not to move forward.

But we have to remember: where would any of us be without our past? The very essence of Jewish peoplehood is based on baggage. And a lot of it. Some of it was horrific (I know Holocaust survivors who still can't bear to open up and tell their story), and some of it was glorious. And I can confidently say that we're one of the strongest, most united people on earth, and it's all because of our baggage.

I know that when my time will come to unpack my baggage, the person by my side will be respectful of what comes out.

Because that's what we do with memories. We hold on to them and we know they'll always be at the back of our minds. But at some point, the memories become just a memory, and the baggage can be tucked away.

SUCCOTH RUBY CARIBBEAN GRAPEFRUIT CHICKEN

2 lg red grapefruits
6 boneless, skinless chicken breasts
1/2 c flour
salt and freshly ground pepper, to taste
6 tblsp unsalted pareve margarine
2/3 c chopped shallots, about 4
1/2 c each: light & dark rum
1/2 c honey
1/4 c fresh lime juice
3 tblsp chopped cilantro
1 c chopped green onions, white and 2" of green

Peel grapefruits, divide into segments; remove seeds. Set aside. Cut breasts into 1" strips. Place the flour in shallow plate and season liberally with salt and pepper. Toss chicken in flour. Heat margarine in large nonstick skillet. Add strips; sauté over medium heat; about 5 minutes. Remove from the pan; drain on paper towels. Add chopped shallots to skillet; saute about 4 minutes. Off the heat, add the rums. Bring rums to a boil; reduce for 3 min. Stir in honey and lime juice; simmer 3 minutes. Remove skillet from heat; stir in cilantro, green onions, grapefruit segments. Arrange chicken strips on a platter; pour sauce over.

Dear Ella,

A few weeks ago, we took our youngest daughter to university in Kingston. My husband and I were so glad to have finally reached this stage after raising three girls.

Imagine how surprised I am to find myself constantly depressed and moping around. The house is so quiet now. When I open the front door, there is no one on the phone, no stereo playing, no TV blasting, no negotiations about going out at night. I honestly never thought I would feel this way. My husband works and is not home as much as I am. He does not feel the void like I do.

I am very happy for my daughter, but this empty nest thing is truly for the birds. Do you have any suggestions how I can move on from feeling this way?

Sadly, Alone at Last

Dear Sadly, Alone at Last,

Having your last child leave home opens up a whole barrage of emotions, everything from joy and relief to sadness and worry. Having your last child leave home is a major life change, and you need to allow yourself time to adjust. You are entering a new phase as a parent, as a wife and as an individual.

As a parent, you have worked toward this time and given your kids the tools they need to become productive, self-sufficient adults. You are letting go to give them the opportunity to put all the life skills you have instilled in them to work.

You need to find new ways to fill the void. Now is the time you can enjoy things that perhaps were not practical while your children were at home. You are limited only by your own imagination. You could volunteer, go back to work, take some courses, join a club, work out, travel, read, revive a hobby, get a new hobby, go out on dates with your husband, get a dog, take up golf. The list is endless.

But remember that your girls are not gone for good. You can still stay in touch and be part of their lives through e-mail, phone calls and visits. The most important thing is to allow yourself the time to make this new adjustment.

Plan every day ahead. You need a routine, but now your routine will revolve around what you want, not what your family needs. You've done a good job. It's your turn now.

How to wipe life's slate clean for the coming year

Life Coach Corner
Judy Siblin-Librach

Every year at this time we reflect on where we've been good, where we've fallen short, and hopefully as we are taking stock, we remind ourselves of the people we want to be, and the people we want to become.

I know I say it a lot, but wishing others well, even silently, is probably one of the greatest gifts and one of the most elevated, beautiful and important things we can do. Instead of the resentful or unhappy feelings of wanting somebody else's success, good fortune, qualities or possessions, how wonderful to be able to look at what you do have and feel abundant, grateful and satisfied.

Satisfaction. I remember how my late grandmother Lillian Siblin was always satisfied with very little–a fridge full of food and a house full of plants and flowers. No matter what, she was self-content.

How deeply satisfied are we with the way we think, act, and behave with others? What would we like to work on? What are three things we would like to improve upon in this coming year?

How can we be more humble, more generous, optimistic, kind, gentle and loving to our significant other, our children, our families and friends?

What does it take to wipe the slate clean and start over?

Abundance. How do we know when we have it even when we don't realize it? Sometimes our cups are so overflowing, and we only notice what is not there and don't notice all that is. How can we be better people in the coming year? What does it take?

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, senior rabbi at Beth Tzedec Synagogue says, "This sacred season emphasizes the universal dimension of our lives – birth and death, sin and forgiveness, growth and harvest. A central message in all these days is to pay attention, to be aware – of ourselves, those around us, and God. Awareness is a stepping stone to appreciation. We have been given many challenges and blessings. Our task is to find a way through the challenges of life to reach a point where we can appreciate our blessings."

What a lovely thought. So this year when we are taking stock, a wonderful way to get started making this the best year of your life is to imagine your future positive self. There is a wonderful story in the book This Year I Will, by M. J. Ryan, where she describes a man who dreamt of becoming a bull rider and the goal in the ring is to stay on the bull for eight seconds. The man worried incessantly about what if he got thrown or trampled, and naturally that is exactly what kept happening. Finally instead of thinking of everything that could go wrong, he imagined everything that could go right. He pictured what he would do with all of his winnings, imagined all of the fans, and he became the United States bull riding champion!

So focus on all of the positive outcomes in your life and maybe three new positive personality traits you would love to adopt in the coming year. As Ryan puts it,

"To create a new positive frame, write yourself a letter from your future. Imagine it's a year from now and that future self has accomplished what you want. The you of the future has lost the weight, become happier, found a new partner, learned to take life more easily. The future you is writing to the you of today about what it's like and how well you're doing. What does it feel like? What surprises have come your way as a result of the change? The future you is a year older and wiser. He or she has learned a lot about how to get from here to there. What message does he or she have to help the you of today to get to that marvelous place?"

Wishing you all a happy and healthy New Year full of much joy, good health, blessings of every kind and lots of bliss!

What are IDF's plans for the next war?

By AMOS HAREL
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Analysis

What will Israel's next war look like? Recent statements from several senior Israeli military officials offer a surprising answer: perhaps much like the last one.

Following on the Israel Defence Forces' failure in the 2006 Second Lebanon War, the army is likely to resume fortifying its manoeuvring capability, represented by the armoured and infantry corps, at the expense of its firepower, particularly that of the air force.

However, a recent interview with the IDF's head of northern command, Gadi Eisenkot, and articles written by two senior reserve officers, indicate that the IDF will continue to give first priority to firepower, even if the targets it chooses are different than those chosen in previous conflicts.

This is not merely a theoretical matter. Though neither Israel nor Hezbollah seems particularly interested in another round of fighting, another conflagration is certainly possible. This could come as a result of a revenge attack for the February killing of senior Hezbollah operative Imad Mughniyah, for which the group blames Israel, or as an Israeli response to the group's smuggling of anti-aircraft weapons into Lebanon.

In a recent interview with the daily Yediot Achronot, Eisenkot presented his "Dahiyah Doctrine," under which the IDF would expand its destructive power beyond what it demonstrated two years ago against the Beirut suburb of Dahiyah, considered a Hezbollah stronghold.

"We will wield disproportionate power against every village from which shots are fired on Israel, and cause immense damage and destruction. From our perspective, these are military bases," he said. "This isn't a suggestion. This is a plan that has already been authorized."

Col. (Res.) Gabriel Siboni recently authored a report through Tel Aviv University's Institute for National Security Studies backing Eisenkot's statements.

The answer to rocket and missile threats from Syria, Lebanon and Gaza, he believes, is "a disproportionate strike at the heart of the enemy's weak spot, in which efforts to hurt launch capability are secondary. As soon as the conflict breaks out, the IDF will have to operate in a rapid, determined, powerful and disproportionate way against the enemy's actions."

Sarcophagus linked to high priest found in excavations near Jerusalem

JTA

JERUSALEM — Archeologists have discovered a sarcophagus fragment that has been linked to one of the high priests who served in the Second Temple.

The fragment made of hard limestone (60 by 48 centimetres, or 3 feet by 19 inches), discovered in salvage excavations along the security fence north of Jerusalem, bears the inscription "Ben Hakohen Hagadol" (son of the high priest).

Though it is impossible to tell which priest's son the inscription refers to, the sarcophagus should probably be identified with one of the priests who officiated in the Second Temple between 30 CE and 70 CE, a news release from the Israel Antiquities Authority indicates. Among the high priests who served during that period were Yosef Bar Kayafa or Caiaphas, Theophilus (Yedidiya) Ben Hanan, Simon Ben Boethus and Hanan Ben Hanan.

The Antiquities Authority said the fragment was believed to have originated on an estate outside Jerusalem that belonged to one of the high priests who served in the Temple.

"One can assume that the son of the high priest passed away for some unknown reason at the time when his father still officiated as the high priest in Jerusalem," it said.

Pools and cisterns, public and residential buildings, and agricultural installations that range in date from the end of the Second Temple period to the early Islamic period have been discovered during the course of the excavations. The area, where the priests resided during the Second Temple period, is associated with the tribe of Benjamin.

The fragment was apparently moved from its original location about 1,000 years ago and was used in the construction of a later Muslim building that was built on top of the ruins of the houses from the Second Temple period.

Reform promotes 'flex-aliyah' as new option

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Stanley Davids and his wife Resa divide their time between homes in Israel and California and they recently spent 10 days touring North America encouraging people to do the same.

The Davids made aliyah in 2004, but they spend a significant amount of time at their home in Santa Monica, Calif., in order to be with family and friends.

Following a recent speaking tour, which began in Toronto and London, Ont., and went on to Chicago, Connecticut and New York, Rabbi Davids said that the Reform movement has decided to promote the couple's living arrangement as a great way to build bridges between North American Jewry and Israel.

"When they retire, people can either buy a second home in Israel and vacation there just like they'd vacation in Florida, or else do what we do, and spend six or seven months of the year in Israel," said Rabbi Davids, who was senior rabbi at Temple Emanu-El in Atlanta for 12 years until his retirement.

Rabbi Stanley Davids and his wife Resa

In the mid-1990s, he said, the Reform movement embraced aliyah as a mitzvah, and in that vein, the Association of Reform Zionists of America (ARZA) brought in a shlichah from New York who was responsible for promoting aliyah.

"She came up with idea that Resa and I speak to Reform congregations about our experience."

"Flex-aliyah" has been a positive experience for them, "because Israel is desperate for an influx of religiously liberal, democratically inclined, western Jews," Rabbi Davids said.

"I believe [Israel] is at a critical turning point in the evolution of social society. There are two powerful forces, secular and ultra-Orthodox, and unless there is some counter-balancing, [the country] could be ripped apart."

He said that even spending two months a year in Israel can make a big difference. "On Friday evenings, we always have guests. They come after services, and we pray and sing. Inevitably, residents in our building say 'You are Reform, and you are celebrating Shabbat.' By our very presence, we are helping to open the eyes of Israelis."

He would like the presence of liberal Jews in Israel expanded, he said, so that "at the most basic areas of human interaction – in the greengrocer, at the barber shop, or even with cab drivers – we can become visible and understood."

Israel has finally awakened to the reality of the importance of this type of aliyah, Rabbi Davids said.

"They see flex-aliyah not as incomplete, but as a new, innovative form. It's being seen as a slow, strong way to make aliyah. Laws are being passed that says new olim do not have to pay income tax on money earned outside of Israel for the next 10 years."

He predicts that the Knesset will pass new laws that will make it possible for "flex-olim" to get insurance, an ulpan, and help with job placement. "Until now, olim had to be there full time, but now the government is ready to say, 'Give it a try.'"

Israel has a right to call for the committed support of those who choose to live in the Diaspora, but as well, "it must support the Jewish lives of our people, wherever they might freely choose to live," Rabbi Davids said.

"At the same time, North American Jews must recognize that they cannot build an affirmative Jewish identity at whose core is an affirmation that real Jewish living can only exist elsewhere."

He believes it's a two-way street. "Both sides need each other. That is pure mutuality."

He called his promotional tour exhilarating and said that people welcomed the "flex-aliyah" idea.

Most Canadians see Jews favourably: poll

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A Leger Marketing survey of Canadian attitudes toward Jews and Muslims conducted last June shows that overall, 73 per cent of Canadians have "favourable" attitudes toward Jews.

The national survey of 1,500 Canadians was commissioned by the Association for Canadian Studies (ACS), with results released only late last month.

The margin of error was 3.9 per cent.

According to ACS executive director Jack Jedwab, the numbers indicate that domestic attitudes toward Jews are roughly in line with results coming from a similar survey of almost 25,000 people in the United States and eight other countries conducted last March by the Pew Research Centre.

"The national survey reveals that the [Canadian] population is somewhat closer to the U.S., Britain, Australia and France, when it comes to the extent to which it expresses favourable opinions of Jews," Jedwab said in an interview.

The United States, according to ACS's merged analysis of the studies, showed only a three percentage point difference in overall favourable attitudes toward Jews compared to Canada (76 per cent versus 73 per cent, respectively).

However, there was more of a difference in overall unfavourable attitudes (13 per cent for Canada and seven per cent for the United States).

A more significant difference fell within the "total favourable" numbers: 41 per cent of Americans considered their attitudes "very favourable" toward Jews, compared to 26 per cent of Canadians.

Jedwab noted as well that the figures revealed a marked discrepancy between the attitudes toward Jews in Quebec and those in the rest of Canada.

Sixty-two per cent of Quebecers said they had favourable attitudes toward Jews, compared to 77 per cent for non-Quebecers. Within the "total favourable" category, however, only 14 per cent of Quebecers said they had a "very favourable" opinion of Jews, compared to 32 per cent for non-Quebecers.

An even more significant finding was in negative attitudes toward Jews: overall, 27 per cent of Quebecers said they had an "unfavourable" opinion of Jews, compared to only seven per cent of non-Quebecers.

Compared to the numbers released by ACS about a year ago, overall favourable opinions of Jews dropped five percentage points – 78 per cent to 73 per cent – for all of Canada, and within that total, it fell 10 percentage points in Quebec, from 72 per cent to 62 per cent.

Jedwab attributed the high "unfavourable" level in Quebec to the fact that Quebec Jews live almost exclusively in Montreal and many francophone Quebecers have never met Jews.

"It's connected to the lack of contact between French Quebecers and Jews," Jedwab said, whether actual or virtual (through the Internet, etc.). "If there was more contact, there would be more favourable numbers."

Jedwab said the issue of "reasonable accommodation" of Quebec's minorities, which dominated headlines over 2007 and 2008 (the Leger survey took place after the Bouchard-Taylor Commission hearings on the issue concluded) might also have influenced the dynamic in the sense that the hearings could have entrenched negative feelings that existed, both toward Muslims and Jews.

At the same time, Jedwab stressed, the most recent figures on attitudes toward Jews in Canada, including Quebec, are consistent with two previous surveys ACS has commissioned since June 2006, suggesting that the issue of "reasonable accommodation" did not play as significant a role as some might think.

"You have to remember that these surveys are snapshots of attitudes," he said.

"Clearly from these results," Jedwab said, "we [Jews] fare reasonably well. Quebec does not fare as well, but there is still a majority opinion favourable toward Jews."

About economics and the election

From the editor's desk

As I write these words, the bad news about the economy – markets, banks, investors, stockbrokers, pension funds, mortgagors, mortagagees, shopkeepers, workers and homeowners – covers the landscape like a carpet of deep snow.

Wherever we walk, we step in it.

Reporters, editorialists and commentators compete to use terminology that conveys appropriate images of despair and panic.

The following lead paragraph from a New York Times story (Oct. 7) was one of the more understated depictions of the current economic calamity.

"When the White House brought out its $700-billion rescue plan two weeks ago, its sheer size was meant to soothe the global financial system, restoring trust and confidence. Three days after the plan was approved, it looks like a pebble tossed into a churning sea." (My emphasis.)

The business analysts on radio and television "lucky" enough to have a microphone thrust into their faces offered that Canada was heading for a profound economic slowdown, if not a full-blown recession.

And worse.

The four corners of the world, intricately woven together by countless billion invisible electronic threads, are feeling the entangling effects of the worldwide economic spool.

Thus, we read the following statement in the same New York Times article as mentioned above.

"The vertiginous drop in stock markets on both sides of the Atlantic… reflected… a growing belief that the crisis could tip the world into a global recession." (My emphasis)

How can readers of such reports and listeners and viewers not feel shivers of panic? But of course, panic is the absolute worst reaction to the economic news. Somehow we must all find the strength to make decisions that convey confidence in our individual and collective futures. The antidote to panic is resolve. We must somehow embrace it.

As we know, and as history teaches, bad times often evoke bad behaviour. These bad times are no different. Some people have sought and found scapegoats for the situation. Not surprisingly, they point to the Jews.

As reported by JTA, the Anti-Defamation League warned last week that "hundreds of anti-Semitic posts regarding Lehman Brothers and other institutions affected by the subprime mortgage crisis have been submitted to discussion boards dealing with finance, with many more arriving by the minute. The messages rail against Jews in general, with some charging that Jews control the government and finance as part of a 'Jew world order' and therefore are to blame for the economic turmoil."

Joining the scapegoating exercise, were the finger-pointers in Hamas. JTA reported that Hamas spokesperson, Fawzi Barhum, issued a statement last week that blamed the "Jewish lobby" in the United States for putting into place and controlling "bad administrative and financial management and a bad banking system."

To his economic theories Barhum added political ones. The Jewish lobby "controls the U.S. elections and defines the foreign policy of any new administration in a manner that allows it to retain control of the American government and economy," he wrote.

Barhum and his ilk are exploiters of misery. Almost always it is the misery of their own people on which they thrive. This economic crisis, alas, extends his reach, but not his character.

The intersection of the Tishrei holidays with the election campaign has rendered a rather unusual production result for this issue of The CJN.

Most readers will receive this paper one or two days after the hard-won dust of victory will have settled upon the shoulders of the winners. The identity of the new government and the composition of the House of Commons will be known to our readers before the paper arrives in their mailboxes.

Yet there will be not one article about the election results in this paper. It will appear to be an egregious omission on our part. But it was not.

Our offices were closed this week on Monday (our usual press day) due to the Thanksgiving holiday. Thus, the paper went to press last Friday, Oct. 10. Complicating matters for our Friday finish, however, was the fact that the two preceding days, Wednesday and Thursday, were Kol Nidrei night and Yom Kippur, respectively.

As a result, most of the stories in this issue were placed into this issue of the paper – the immediate post-election issue of The CJN – by 3 p.m. last Wednesday afternoon, fully five days before the election itself.

In next week's issue – nine days after the date of the election – we plan to provide our election coverage. But, because of Thanksgiving and Sukkot we will have essentially only two days to put the paper together.

Such are the challenges and exigencies of publishing a weekly Jewish newspaper. We trust our readers will understand. MBD

JUST AFTER SUKKOT, THE WAR ENDED

On Oct. 22, 1973 – 16 days after the start of what became known as the Yom Kippur War – the United Nations Security Council unanimously adopted the American-Soviet brokered Resolution 338. It called for an immediate ceasefire and peace talks to implement UN Security Council Resolution 242 of 1967, which ended the Six Day War. The Israeli soldiers in this photo are conducting prayers in their military encampment in the Sinai Desert on Hoshanah Rabah. The fighting ended five days later. On Nov. 11, 1973, Egypt and Israel signed a ceasefire agreement. [IGPO photo]

Genocide studies curriculum launched in Ont.

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies (FSWC) has launched a new genocide studies curriculum that is being piloted by the Limestone District School Board in Kingston, Ont.

The curriculum, called "Genocide Humankind's Perpetual Failure," is geared to senior high school students in Canadian and world studies courses, as well as Canadian and international law and English courses.

It complies with Ontario Ministry of Education guidelines, said Michael Ettedgui, FSWC's education consultant, at the Sept. 26 launch, held at the organization's Toronto office.

Ettedgui, who developed the curriculum over the past two years, said that education is "our strongest hope."

Nate Leipciger

He commended teachers involved in the pilot program for their courage in tackling a difficult subject.

Vanessa Pignataro, one of seven teachers who, along with 15 students, travelled to Toronto for the launch, told The CJN that genocide has been covered in class before, "but not in a direct way."

Also, she noted, the curriculum offers a way to address other issues, such as bullying, which is presented as an example of a starting point that can lead to genocide.

"It's so important for us to teach [about genocide], so students realize what's happening around the world," she said.

FSWC president Avi Benlolo told the audience at the launch that "by learning about past tragedies, students will be equipped to spot trouble in the future and act on it for the benefit of Canada and the world."

Despite recent conflict in Africa, Asia and the Middle East, and Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's repeated threats against Israel and his challenging the veracity of Holocaust history, Benlolo said he is an optimist.

"What has changed?" he asked. "We have changed," he answered, referring to those in the room and others like them.

Keynote speaker Nate Leipciger urged those present to use the services of Holocaust survivors like himself who are willing to share their experiences to educate others.

Leipciger – who by coincidence was speaking on the 60th anniversary of his arrival in Canada – spoke of the hunger, cold and "unbearable conditions" that he experienced in concentration camps.

"We struggled to cling to life with our last fibre of strength," he said. "Each day more of us died, and more were taken away, never to be seen again."

His voice thick with emotion, Leipciger said that he had just visited his father's grave a few days before – the only grave he is able to go to, having lost his mother, sister, grandparents, six of his father's siblings, their spouses, and dozens of his cousins in the Holocaust.

Lamenting Ahmadinejad's message at the United Nations General Assembly last month, Leipciger said, "For years Holocaust survivors have confronted Holocaust deniers."

Now, he said, instead of confronting "the likes of [disgraced historian] David Irving and [jailed neo-Nazi] Ernst Zundel, today we have to confront presidents and heads of state. We must become stronger and more vocal in our resolve, and we must act now."

He called the curriculum launch "an auspicious occasion" and said he was happy to see so many young people there.

Ettedgui, in thanking Leipciger, recalled that Leipciger had accompanied his March of the Living trip when Ettedgui was 16, and that Leipciger said at the time, "You can't hate, because it destroys the person doing the hating."

Christina Running
[F. Kraft photos]

Meri MacLeod, human rights education adviser for the Limestone District School Board, said the new curriculum is about collaboration and breaking the silence.

"For me, it's about moving even beyond tolerance," she said. "I want people to accept human diversity. That is the only way the human race will continue."

Grade 11 student Christina Running, 16, one of four Kingston students who last year went into a Grade 8 classroom to address students who had set up an Internet hate site, said that students should be educated about genocide "so we can tell people about it, so they're aware and know what to do when they are confronted with this subject.

Sam Roy, a Grade 12 student, said that for a lot of people, the Holocaust is "just too big to understand. It's hard to imagine six million people. That means more people than I have ever met in my life have died."

Even though it happened 60 years ago, Jews are still discriminated against, Roy said. "If you don't teach it, people will forget."

THROUGH ROSES

SAUL RUBINEK, well-known stage, television and film actor, was born in a Displaced Persons camp in Germany after WWII, where his father ran a Yiddish Repertory Theatre company. Mr. Rubinek's non-fiction book, So Many Miracles, is an account of his parents' survival growing up in Poland during WWII. His award-winning documentary of the same title chronicles his parents' reunion with the people who saved their lives during the Holocaust.

Mr. Rubinek will direct and star in Through Roses, a poignant one-hour play about the tyranny of memory. He will be accompanied by musicians from Toronto's Royal Conservatory of Music.

This evening's performance, which closes Holocaust Education Week 2008, will commemorate the 70th anniversary of Kristallnacht, the Night of Broken Glass, November 9-10, 1938.

A third Rosh Hashanah

Nearly every week, irrespective of the weather, a handful of Israelis gather in Rabin Square in Tel Aviv to rally and demonstrate on behalf of Gilad Schalit, the Israel Defence Forces soldier who was abducted by Hamas terrorists in June 2006. They do so to try to ensure that Schalit's name will not fall from the public agenda.

Last week however, days before Yom Kippur and in the true spirit of the holy day, thousands of Israelis came together at the square to join Schalit's family in begging the young man's forgiveness that he remains, still, in captivity. We can only imagine the sorrowful power as parents and nation pleaded for the release of their son. The occasion was emotional and melancholy.

The pleas and the anger and the frustration however were not directed at the government of Israel. Rather, they were aimed at an essentially indifferent world whose indignation over Hamas barbarism seems now nearly exhausted, if not actually spent. First and foremost, however, the pleas were directed at the Hamas leaders in Damascus and Gaza. For theirs is the whim of hatred and cruelty that controls the fate of Gilad Schalit.

Hamas is reportedly demanding the release of some 1,400 Palestinians in Israeli jails, including those who have carried out violent attacks against Israelis, in exchange for Schalit's freedom. Israel, apparently, has agreed to hand over 450 prisoners. But Hamas' response has been the curt reply of senior Hamas official Osama Al-Muzaini. "No breakthrough can be achieved before the Zionist enemy agrees to all the conditions and all the names on the list we have handed over."

Egypt has been trying to broker a power-sharing agreement between Hamas and Fatah that Israel hopes will facilitate Schalit's release. The parties met last week in Cairo.

But most Israelis are losing hope. Indeed security officials have warned publicly that time is running out.

Three Rosh Hashanah holidays have now elapsed since Schalit was kidnapped. He is imprisoned, likely in a dark place, somewhere in Gaza. But he is not, alas, with his family, where he should be – where all sons should be.

We stand with the Schalit family and with the people of Israel. As they have promised, we will never let the cause of Gilad Schalit's freedom or the affirmation of the irreplaceability of his life fall from our hearts, our minds or the public agenda.

25 years ago in The CJN

As Yitzhak Shamir became Israel's seventh prime minister, he was forced to deal with a serious economic crisis – soaring inflation, the devaluation of the shekel, rising gas prices, and a 50 per cent cut in government subsidies on meat, dairy products and bread.

Rabbis and pre-Civil War slavery

Sheldon Kirshner in his article "Jews and blacks in the United States" (CJN, Sept. 18) points to Prof. Cheryl Lynn Greenberg's thesis in Troubling the Waters: Black-Jewish Relations in the American Century to suggest that Jews played virtually no role in public debates over slavery prior to the Civil War.

It must be pointed out that the prominent rabbis at that time did indeed speak out against the institution of slavery in the decade prior to the American Civil War. Careful examination of the situation shows that Rabbi Max Lilienthal of Cincinnati; Rabbi Liebman Adler and Rabbi Bernhard Felsenthal of Chicago; Rabbi David Einhorn originally from Baltimore, which was in a border slave state; and Rabbi Samuel M. Isaacs of New York all spoke out forthrightly in favour of the Union cause of abolitionism and the emancipation of the slaves. Rabbi Isaac Leeser of Philadelphia, who had spent time in Richmond, the capital of the Confederacy, took a more neutral position, with equal regard for both sides. The most vocal opposing point of view came from Rabbi Morris Raphall of New York City, who placed Judaism in direct opposition to the philosophy of abolitionism, based on his interpretation of the biblical tradition and law that guaranteed the right to own slaves. As suggested in this article, for the most part, rabbis in the South gave complete support to the institution of slavery.

Received Rosh Hashanah card from PM

I received a Rosh Hashanah card from Prime Minister Stephen Harper recently. While I do not generally complain about greeting cards, I feel this one raises a number of concerns.

The first issue is that of political pandering. While all political parties are guilty of it, I have never seen a political party go as far as the Tories have to woo niche audiences.

The second, more troubling issue is that of privacy. How did the Conservatives find out my religion? I certainly never volunteered it to them, and if they acquired it from census data, I never intended for that information to be surrendered to a third party – let alone to a political party prowling for ethnic voters.

While I am proud of my Jewish heritage, I remain cautious about divulging my Jewish identity to others. I am keenly aware of the hostility that still exists towards Jews in many circles. We often hear about vandals desecrating Jewish cemeteries and synagogues in Toronto and Montreal, anti-Semitic remarks from community leaders, and even about terrorist plots against Jewish sites. With these things in mind, it makes me uneasy to know a record of my Jewish affiliation, alongside my current address, might be available and accessible from a government database.

Hopefully, the Conservative party will be more sensitive to these concerns the next time it considers reaching out to ethnic minorities. Clearly, this is unacceptable.

Charity begins at home

After reading "New Israeli humanitarian group launched" (CJN, Sept. 4), about the work of a new NGO in Israel and abroad called Adam LeAdam that supports international Jewish aid, I was distressed, because North American and Israeli Jews are forgetting that charity begins at home.

I volunteer with Lev U'Neshama, which provides food, eye glasses, shoes and gently used clothing, as well as other services, to Safed's impoverished citizens. We receive donations from individuals – Jewish and non-Jewish – from around the world, but the organized Jewish world just doesn't seem to care.

I still wonder what happened to all the money raised by caring Canadian Jews for the Jewish community in northern Israel that devastated by the Second Lebanon War in 2006.

CIJR has been on campus for 20 years

While giving extensive coverage to Jewish groups operating on university campuses, and even worthy non-Jewish groups such as STAND Canada, the article "Campus groups offer students a break" (CJN, Sept. 11) omitted any reference to the Canadian Institute for Jewish Research (CIJR) and its 20-year record of on-campus activity. CIJR's Student Israel-Advocacy Program; our Dateline: Middle East magazine, written and edited by students, and our regular colloquia series, featuring noted academics and experts, offer students the opportunity to exchange ideas on Israel and the Middle East.

Off campus, our activities include publishing the Israfax magazine, which provides Israel and geo-political analysis; our daily Isranet briefing, which counters anti-Israelism and explores Jewish and other global issues, and a weekly French communique. We also publish a biweekly online journal, Israzine, and maintain an extensive research resource, the Middle East and Jewish World Databank.

The most radical traditionalist: Samson Raphael Hirsch

By PAUL SHAVIV

This year, 2008, marks the dual anniversaries of 200 years since the birth and 120 years since the death of one of the most remarkable and important figures in post-Emancipation Jewish thought: Rabbi Samson Raphael Hirsch, born in Hamburg in 1808 and died in Frankfurt in 1888.

During the opening decades of the 19th century, Germany was in turmoil. The ideas of the French Revolution and the Enlightenment were sweeping Europe. Jews, newly emancipated and with sudden access to every corner of western life, found their old traditions defenceless and incongruent. What had been accepted as natural in the Judengasse – the narrow, high streets of the German ghettos – seemed unbearably old fashioned in the glare of the open society.

The syntheses offered by Moses Mendelssohn (who died in 1786) and, later, by the nascent Reform movement spoke to those already partially or completely outside the "four cubits" of tradition. The scale of assimilation was huge. No defence or explanation of traditional Jewish belief or practice (later to be termed "Orthodoxy") was available in any modern European language.

Enter Rabbi Hirsch, who took upon himself the Maimonidean task of being the articulator of Judaism for his time and place.

By the age of 30, he had already published two of his best-known works. His Nineteen Letters was a dialogue on faith and Judaism between a thinly disguised Rabbi Hirsch ("Naftali") and an imaginary young, skeptical German-Jewish student.

The ghetto in Frankfurt, c. 1860

The massive Horeb was a thorough exposition on the theory and practice of the commandments, written in pure German. Toward the end of his career, he published further major works, all in German – a commentary on the Chumash and commentaries on the Psalms and on the siddur. All became staples of German-Jewish traditional life.

He was, in a sense, a one-man, 19th-century, German ArtScroll. Rabbi Hirsch was also a prolific essayist and polemicist – his Collected Works constitute seven volumes. All were devoted to the defence and rationalization of tradition, as well as attacks on Reform and the newly emergent Wissenschaft movement, the academic and scholarly exploration of the Jewish past.

But Rabbi Hirsch is perhaps best known for two things: the Orthodox secession (Austritt) from the official Frankfurt Jewish community, and his insistence on embracing all of cultural, scientific and esthetic knowledge within his overall philosophy of Orthodoxy. This was his theory of "Torah im derech eretz" – Torah and general culture.

After a varied career, in 1851, at age 43, he relinquished the prestigious post of Chief Rabbi of Moravia to accept a "call" from the small, apparently beleaguered Orthodox community of Frankfurt-am-Main.

By law, every individual had to declare their religious belief, and a small portion of their tax was paid by the government to their "church," or, in the case of the Jewish community, to their central community organization, the Gemeinde. The Gemeinde ran the communal organizations and employed rabbis. By mid-century, most of these were controlled by elected directors who were sympathetic to the Reform movement. But in most cities, there was tolerance of the Orthodox minority, and they were given appropriate budgets for their own requirements.

That was not the case in Frankfurt, where the Gemeinde was militantly Reform and refused to finance many facilities needed by the Orthodox group. Rabbi Hirsch saw an opportunity when the state parliament considered a bill that would enable Christian sects to secede from the established church and would allow them to receive tax income from their adherents. On grounds of equity, a similar provision was enacted for the Jewish community, and in 1876, Rabbi Hirsch constituted his group into a separate Gemeinde of its own.

Rabbi Samson Raphael Hirsch

This unprecedented secession from the main community created a storm. Rabbi Hirsch maintained that, if legally permitted to do so, Orthodox Jews had a religious duty to separate from any Jewish organization whose policies and operations were not in accordance with Orthodox Jewish practice. Faced with the threat of secession, the Frankfurt community promised a series of concessions, effectively establishing an "Orthodox division." Many Orthodox leaders accepted the new arrangement and were wary of breaking Jewish unity.

But Rabbi Hirsch was adamant. In fact, only about one-third of his community officially seceded – a great disappointment to him. In the succeeding years, he devoted himself to building a model community of synagogues, schools and hospitals run on strictly Orthodox lines. His philosophy of separation – not wholly successful at its inception – was, however, to be taken up with vigour as a standard of 20th- (and 21st-) century Orthodox political strategy.

The second well-known legacy of Rabbi Hirsch is his "Torah im derech eretz" philosophy of Judaism. He held that Orthodoxy should embrace the wider world as part of a comprehensive religious philosophy and not withdraw from it. Strictly Orthodox Hirschian rabbis and learned laymen obtained doctorates in all branches of arts and science from leading universities. Institutions such as Yeshiva University, Bar-Ilan University and Jerusalem's Shaare Zedek and Bikkur Cholim hospitals owe much to Rabbi Hirsch's philosophy.

As formulated by Rabbi Hirsch, this philosophy occasionally involved intricate apologetics, as he took it as axiomatic that "secular" knowledge could never disprove "Torah true" (Gesetztreue) Judaism.

In today's intensively Orthodox community, the argument is whether Rabbi Hirsch intended this ideology as a temporary tactic to attract and hold the very vulnerable 19th century German Jewry, or did he mean it as a philosophy that is valid for every time and place? It should be noted that even the ArtScroll biographer of Rabbi Hirsch believes he meant the latter.

You do not have to be a Hirschian (I am not) – sharing his philosophy of community, and/or his religious ideas, heavy with symbolism, and occasionally eccentric scholarship – to admire Rabbi Hirsch or regard him as a genius. Single-handedly, he established a uniquely German-Jewish Orthodox tradition. Rabbi Hirsch exhibited a radicalism, a practical vision, an energy and a religious and philosophical imagination that mark him out from all of his contemporaries, and from many other Jewish leaders, before and after. He was a true gadol.

Opinions

The issues we need to confront

Being both American and Canadian, I have lately found myself in the unenviable position of having to vote in two important elections. In both cases, people seem to have been avoiding the issues. Here in

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

Canada, and especially in Quebec, no matter what the media might have implied, the texts and subtexts should not have been about blue sweaters, lipstick or personalities. They should have been about health and education.

We have the potential to have the best health and education systems on the continent – and perhaps in the world. Both in our health care system and in our publicly funded education system, the theoretical goal of universal access, choice and availability is first rate. The current implementation, however, leaves much to be desired.

We need representatives who will address these issues as their primary goals.

I recently spent a great deal of time in the United States taking care of an ill relative. The health care system has failed Americans. Too many of them aren't covered. Others live in fear that an illness will wipe them out or that their insurance won't cover their latest illness.

Even if they are covered, insurance plans never pay for everything. After all the bills seem to have been paid, people can get one from the anesthesiologist for $4,000, because he just happened not to be part of the hospital plan. And if that doesn't sink them, they arrive home ready to recuperate with one month's worth of forms and paperwork to fill out in order to get insurance benefits.

We Canadians don't know how good we have it.

But if we don't elect representatives who will fix our system, we will face the same kind of disorder that the Americans live with. I, for one, don't want that.

Why can we not have more family doctors in Montreal? How come we don't have the funds to pay for more nurses, but we have the funds for forced overtime? Why can't the government authorize more specialists when the doctors we have are overworked and need help? These aren't simply money matters, but there are fiscal issues as well.

Our education system is also lacking the right kind of attention. It has potential, but it's not the functioning system we deserve. At the university level, we are routinely underfunded. This has undermined our entire system. We can't hire the best with the lowest salary scale. We can't recruit without great labs and small classes. Some schools are unwilling or unable to even give their faculty a cost-of-living pay scale. There are known remedies, but they're not discussed openly and honestly.

This column was written before the election. Now that it's over, let's make our representatives represent us!

Electing to walk in God's paths

Having just returned from the United States, I was amazed at the relative calm of our just-completed Canadian political campaign. What's going on with our cousins to the south is nothing less than a hatefest, as opposed to a close look at opposing platforms.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

At the risk of being naïve, I looked.

Thinking this way, I was reminded of a drashah on parshat Ki Tavo. Coupled with luminous blessings comes the phrase, "If you will keep the commandments of the Lord your God and walk in his paths."

What does it mean "to walk in God's paths?" Surely humankind is not capable of doing so. The rabbis knew this and so taught: "The verse means to teach us that we should follow the attributes of the Holy One. As God clothes the naked, you should clothe the naked. The Torah teaches that the Holy One visited the sick; you should visit the sick. The Holy One comforted those who mourned; you should comfort those who mourn. The Holy One buried the dead; you should bury the dead." (Sotah 14:a)

In other words, we must do the right thing for those who cannot do for themselves.

Today in North America, we see the results of what happens when the most vulnerable are not attended to: vast inequality of wealth, with the gap growing larger. Health care in the United States is beyond the ability of 47 million people to afford. Billions are being spent to fight wars, while at home, people ousted from their homes by Hurricane Katrina three years ago (not to mention the thousands who are losing their homes in the mortgage crisis) wait in vain for help. And should I mention the people whose retirement savings have been eroded, if not wiped out, by unchecked goings-on on Wall Street?

OK, that's the United States' problem. What about us?

We, too, have a growing income gap, with homeless and mentally ill people roaming our streets, and families so broken that their children seek the street as refuge.

Examining the daily coverage of the campaign and the speeches of the candidates, I looked for a party with a plan to address the social issues of the day.

On Sept. 22, I read that the Liberals would increase spending on social housing, foreign aid and medical care, while the Conservatives said they will get tough on young offenders. (That says to me: go into jail a young thug, come out a seasoned criminal.)

Let me give you a few examples of how I saw "walk in God's ways" in our recent campaign.

In the early 1990s, the federal government abruptly cancelled all plans to build affordable (then called social) housing. I don't know what happened in Toronto or Montreal, but Vancouver's ability to provide housing for vulnerable, low-income families virtually disappeared. The province never stepped in to address the issue, and today you read headlines about homelessness, tent cities and despair on our streets.

So I want a government that will house the vulnerable.

If you live on the streets, you will turn to anything that will dull the misery you feel. I will not support a government that closes supervised drug injection sites. In the 1990s, when I worked for the Vancouver Health Board, at least 200 people – two hundred! – were dying of drug overdoses on our streets each year. Hundreds more were taken to emergency rooms, then turned out to fend for themselves once again. That figure has dwindled as the InSite supervised injection site has saved lives and directed many to treatment programs.

I want a government that will tend to the sick in heart and body.

Yes, I want my government to support Israel, but that's not my first criterion for who gets my vote. Realistically, I know that Canada's voice at the table is very, very small. Any Middle East solution will not happen because we support it, but because larger nations enforce it, and because Israel and the Palestinians accept it.

So I decided to use my vote this year to tell our government to remember that we, as a civil society, have a responsibility to emulate the attributes of God. Only then are we on the right path to being human.

State of the Canadian Jewish community

By the time this article is published, Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur will be over and we will be enjoying the week of Sukkot. The days get cooler, the nights grow longer, and we settle into another year of work, school, retirement or whatever activities occupy us.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

The High Holiday season encourages reflection not only on our Jewish lives but also on our community and the various issues that engage us in discussion and occupy these columns year-round. There is much good news. We enjoy the freedom and opportunity to pursue any ambitions we have, whether they are in business, industry, the professions, education, science or the arts. We are free to worship, celebrate our holidays and festivals, and enjoy our rich traditions and customs.

The Canadian Jewish community has taken many positive initiatives over the past year. We have continued to work with other cultural groups, including the aboriginal community, to forge common understanding and closer relations. We have continued to interact with governments, at all levels, to create a lasting and stable niche for Canadian Jews within our national mosaic.

To be sure, our work continues. Through its Social Action Advisory Committee, the Canadian Jewish Congress has launched a national poverty strategy aimed at eliminating poverty through an augmentation of government funding programs to facilitate more child care and more affordable housing. We cannot, however, be complacent. We must continually confront issues of concern to our community.

There are still pockets of anti-Semitism and bigotry in our nation, and people who incite hate and prejudice, largely on the Internet. B'nai Brith's annual report of anti-Semitic incidents continues to mention increases in such occurrences in Canada. There was a recent physical attack – an isolated incident – on haredi Jews in Sainte Agathe, Que, however, the response from officials and the broader community was appropriate. During the recent federal election campaign, anti-Jewish comments were posted on some blogs, including an outrageous allegation by a Winnipeg area candidate who implied that Israel's Mossad was complicit in 9/11.

Although that candidate's nomination was subsequently rescinded, this episode points to the ever-present cloud of anti-Jewish sentiment.

Support for Israel is far from universal. There have been some viciously hateful anti-Israel activities on some of our university campuses. We must also be constantly mindful of the threatening attitude of Iran and its state policy advocating the eradication of Israel. And the spectre of a so-called Durban II reminds us of the blatant anti-Israel, anti-Semitic circus that marked the original UN anti-racism conference of 2001.

There are also issues to be resolved within organized Judaism, including the lack of egalitarianism within certain segments of our religious community. While acknowledging the tenets and beliefs of those supporting traditional religious practices, it is unacceptable, for example, that a person wishing to recite Kaddish for a loved one is denied the opportunity to do so because the women who are present in the congregation do not count in the minyan. Women have always been an integral part of Jewish life, and their voices should be heard in all aspects of our religious community. Changes will no doubt occur over time, but it is a slow and arduous process

Although not all the news is good, there is reason for optimism. The co-presidents of Canadian Jewish Congress, Rabbi Reuven Bulka and Sylvain Abitbol, reminded us in their Rosh Hashanah message to the community that we should be asking ourselves "to be our best, to do our best. This means taking life seriously, living up to our sacred calling, faithfully living up to our responsibilities, and to add a bit of seasoning to all this, allocating some time to helping others."

As we celebrate this season of harvest, growth and natural plenty, let us feel confident and renewed as we strengthen our commitment to face the issues ahead. Sukkot is also known as Z'man Simchateinu, the season of our rejoicing. That's the spirit that we should carry forward as we embark on the new year.

The Kirshner File

The past haunts Jews and Poles

"Facts are stubborn things," sighed Antony Polonsky, a Brandeis University historian regarded as one of the pre-eminent experts on 20th century Poland and Polish-Jewish relations.

As Polonsky, a South African-born Jew of Lithuanian origin, reflected on the nation he has studied methodically and visited frequently since the mid-1960s, he lamented that the past, that jumbled accumulation of convenient and inconvenient facts, has been a source of contention between Poles and Jews for at least 60 years.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

"Since 1945, Poles and Jews have been divided, above all, by their diametrically opposed and incompatible views of a shared but divisive past," he told a conference here recently marking the 20th anniversary of the Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation of Canada.

In an interview, Polonsky – a scholar whose books, monographs and editorship of the journal Polin have shed light on Poland – ascribed the clashing views to an absence of mutual trust, which, he observed, was largely destroyed by a series of acrimonious events from Polish independence in 1918 to the present day.

Let us count the mutual grievances.

Poles have not forgotten that Jews welcomed the Red Army invasion of eastern Poland in 1939 and collaborated on a large scale with the Soviet occupiers. That accusation rings true, but Jews maintain that Soviet domination, for all its warts, was preferable to Nazi genocidal brutality.

Poles harbour bitterness over the disproportionate number of Jews who actively participated in the country's postwar pro-Soviet Communist regime, and particularly in its repressive security apparatus. It is true that some Jews regarded Communism as an integrative force in a society rife with anti-Semitism, yet the vast majority of Jews were definitely not Communists.

Jews, for their part, recite a long litany of incidents that, they argue, set the tone for Polish-Jewish relations: the anti-Jewish violence that accompanied Poland's attainment of independence after World War I, the intensification of anti-Semitism following the death of Polish leader Jozef Pilsudski in 1935, the widespread indifference of Poles to Jewish victimization during the Holocaust, the outbreak of pogroms in the wake of World War II, and the eruption of a state-sponsored anti-Zionist propaganda campaign that surfaced after Israel's victory in the Six Day War and mutated into a full-blown anti-Semitic purge in 1968, resulting in the mass emigration of assimilated Jews from Poland.

Polonsky – whose books range from Politics in Independent Poland to The Great Powers and the Polish Question 1941-1945 – believes that the nadir in Polish-Jewish relations was reached in the period from 1944 to 1947, when Poland was occupied by the Nazis and then made the transition from capitalism to Communism. This was an era characterized by Nazi incitement, country-wide pogroms (of which the pogrom in Kielce was the most glaring example), a civil war that pitted nationalists against Communists and Jewish demands for the return of confiscated property.

Polish-Jewish relations were also battered between 1935 and 1939, when economic boycotts were launched against Jews and so-called ghetto benches were introduced at Polish universities. But even during these dark days, liberal Polish forces opposed such trends, Polonsky points out. As for the period from 1967 onward, Polonsky said, "Anti-Semitism had more support among Poles than one would like to believe." Yet broadly speaking, Poles were more anti-Russian and anti-Soviet than anti-Semitic, he noted.

The burning issue that sets Poles and Jews apart today is the restitution of personal property, which is really both a Jewish and a Christian problem. "I want to see this issue resolved," said Polonsky, "but you need a very strong Polish government to do this. I don't see why the Poles can't deal with it." Yet, drawing on a historical analogy, he is far from optimistic that all claimants will be satisfied, even in the event of a fairly equitable solution. "How many nobles in France got back their land after the French Revolution? None."

Polonsky, however, is heartened by the fact that Poles are now willing to honestly examine "thorny and difficult" problems associated with the past. This attitude stems from a growing interest in Poland's Jewish minority, which formed almost 10 per cent of its population on the eve of 1939 and constituted one of the most important communities in the Diaspora.

Antony Polonsky

"There is a certain fascination with and nostalgia for Jewish culture in Poland today," he said. "It has something to do with the longing for Poland's pre-war multi-ethnic diversity."

Poland's "rediscovery" of Polish Jews occurred in the late 1970s and 1980s. Enrolment for lectures at universities on the history of Polish Jews surpassed expectations. Books on Jewish topics were snapped up. Plays on Jewish themes sold out.

"Similarly, at that time, the Catholic church and the opposition began to sponsor weeks of Jewish culture, during which school children and university students attended lectures on Jewish subjects and participated in the restoration of Jewish cemeteries. Catholic monthlies like Znak and Wiez devoted whole issues to Jewish topics, a phenomenon that has continued since the end of Communism in 1989. One of its most striking manifestations has been the enormously popular annual Festival of Jewish Culture in Krakow."

Under the impact of these developments, and a greater sense of self-esteem among Poles following the rise of the Solidarity trade union movement, Poles were no longer as hesitant to scrutinize touchy historical issues.

As Polonsky put it, "There was more of a willingness to examine the more controversial aspects of the Polish past and to consider more critically how Poles had treated the other peoples alongside whom they had lived, namely Jews and Ukrainians."

In league with these developments, Poland's younger generation voiced a growing feeling of shame over the events of 1968. "The realization set in that one of the consequences of those years, during which Polish society had allowed itself to be manipulated by crude anti-Semitic slogans, was to deprive Poland of most of what remained of its Jewish intelligentsia."

Taking notice of what had happened in Poland, Jewish and Polish organizations in the United States established a task force "to overcome misunderstanding and promote mutual respect." Out of this emerged an academic conference at Columbia University on the theme of "Poles and Jews: Myths and Reality in the Historical Context."

Further conferences followed, culminating with a Hebrew University symposium attended by more than 300 scholars, including 80 from Poland. "This sequence of conferences created a new situation," said Polonsky, who lately has been working on a three-volume history of Jews in Poland and Russia from 1350 onward.

"It created an international cadre of scholars interested in Polish Jewish history and provided them with a forum in which they could express their views."

Thanks to these events, he observed, Poles and Jews may well be positioned to improve their historic relationship. "Apologetics will increasingly be replaced by careful and detailed research and reliable, nuanced first-hand testimony. It should be possible to move beyond strongly held competing and incompatible narratives of the past and reach some consensus that will be acceptable to people of goodwill and will bring about a degree of normalization both in Poles' attitudes to the past and Polish-Jewish relations."

Israel's experiences with terrorism have helped U.S., says expert

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israel's first-hand experiences with terrorism have helped its ally, the United States, according to American bioterrorism expert Leonard Cole.

Cole, the author of a newly published book, Terror: How Israel Has Coped And What America Can Learn, told a Temple Sinai audience recently that Israel has carved out a niche of expertise in three interrelated fields – communications, hospital drills and terror medicine.

In Israel, security agencies and police and firefighting forces are on the same radio frequency and thus confusion is avoided.

By comparison, the New York City police and fire department used different radio frequencies during the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center, causing unnecessary loss of life among these responders.

Since the outbreak of the second Palestinian uprising in 2000, Israeli hospitals have held a major drill at least once a year in anticipation of terrorist assaults.

But in the United States, there are no such regulations, said Cole, an adjunct professor of political science at Rutgers University in Newark, N.J. who also holds degrees in the health sciences, public policy and dental medicine.

Due to the high number of Israelis killed in suicide attacks in the past eight years, doctors in Israel have perfected techniques to deal with multiple penetration wounds.

In the United States, however, trauma surgeons rarely deal with such cases, noted Cole, an advisory board member of the International Institute for Counter-Terrorism and a trustee of the Washington Institute for Near East Policy.

Saying that Israelis have proven to be admirably resilient in coping with terrorism, Cole pointed out that bombed cafes, for example, are usually back in business within 36 hours of an attack.

Even during the height of the intifadah, in 2002, 90 per cent of Israelis surveyed by pollsters said they intended to remain in the country.

He ascribed Israeli resilience to two factors: a great sense of community and a feeling that Jews in Israel should remain in their homeland, come what may.

"The Israelis have backbone," he observed.

Stewart Bell, a reporter on the staff of the National Post who specializes in terrorism and has written books on the topic, was the second speaker.

Governments face two major challenges,* Post *reporter says

Saying that terrorists no longer practise restraint since they are theologically driven, Bell observed that governments combating terrorism today face two major challenges.

Terrorists have targeted Canada for three reasons: the Canadian army has joined the battle against the Taliban in Afghanistan, Canada and the United States are close allies, and Canada is home to a fairly large Jewish community.

Though not suggesting that a major terrorist incident is imminent here, Bell warned it is "not out of the question."

In a brief survey of terrorism in Canada, he cited attacks mounted by Sikhs and Armenians and pointed out that the problem of homegrown terrorism has begun to emerge.

Homegrown terrorists regard terror as a legitimate response to grievances, said Bell, whose books include The Martyr's Oath and Cold Terror.

Some Canadians support terrorism abroad, while terrorists themselves use Canada for purchasing weapons, planning attacks, disseminating propaganda and finding hideouts, he said.

Canadian security services have uncovered terrorist plots, but Canadians should not be complacent about terrorism, Bell said.

Imagine the Possibilities!

"We imagine that the possibilities for our children are endless. With an Associated education they can go on to pursue whatever their dreams may be. To be an artist, an entrepreneur, a pilot, a physician, an athlete, a scholar… anything will be within their reach. And we know they will go forward with the Jewish knowledge and a sense of community that will enable them to lead future generations."

UNCOMPROMISING EXCELLENCE

Our outstanding academic program provides preschoolers and all of our students with an unparalleled educational foundation that includes literacy, math and science. At the same time, children learn Hebrew through innovative communicative Hebrew and Immersion programs. Your child will learn at a pace and a level that will astound you.

INNOVATION FOR THE WHOLE CHILD

Using an integrated General/Judaic Studies model, we have created programs that that stimulate the musical and artistic, activate the physical, and stir the spiritual while emphasizing our responsibility to the environment and the community around us.

AN UNBELIEVABLE PRESCHOOL EXPERIENCE

Associated parents are raving about the calibre of the faculty and the richness of resources in our Bet Hayeled. You'll be blown away by how much your child is learning and incredibly impressed with the loving and nurturing environment in which it takes place.

CENTRE FOR DIVERSE LEARNING

We are meeting the needs of a broad range of learners through a program that was created with the expertise of two of North America's foremost experts in the field. From pre-school on up, we can provide your child with individualized programs and attention as we allow every child to reach his or her unique potential.

FLEXIBLE AND EXTENDED PRESCHOOL PROGRAMS

We're responding to the lives of today's parents by providing multiple options for afternoon programs that meet your child's needs and your busy schedule.

TECHNOLOGY INTEGRATION PLAN

More than just acquiring SMARTboards and other educational technologies, we're becoming experts at integrating them into both our Judaic and General Studies curricula to deliver a true 21st century education for your child.

100 YEARS OF RESULTS

A century of educational success provides a wealth of experience and a record of achievement that is powering Associated into its next century. This foundation combined with our strong vision for the future gives each of our students an extra edge.

A MIDDLE SCHOOL IN A LEAGUE OF ITS OWN

Toronto's only free standing Jewish Middle School provides students with the powerful academic grounding for their future success while offering a safe environment teeming with extra curricular, social and inspirational experiences. So, we're not surprised when we hear the many success stories of Associated grads.

THE EDUCATIONAL DREAM TEAM

Our educational leaders are some of the most qualified and sought after educational professionals in North America. Campus principals and vice principals are delivering leading-edge programs while inspiring teachers and creating positive and open relationships with parents. You'll really enjoy meeting them.

Europe grows more wary of Iranian threat

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Although Iran is not currently dominating the headlines – largely because of the world financial crisis – international news agencies nonetheless continue to monitor Tehran's nuclear ambitions.

"French minister warns of Israeli strike on Iran" by Agence France-Press (Edmonton Journal, Oct. 6) covered a visit to Jerusalem by French Foreign Minister Bernard Kouchner.

AFP reported that Kouchner told Ha'aretz "he hoped tough diplomacy and sanctions would persuade Iran to halt its uranium enrichment program, which Israel and many western countries believe is aimed at developing nuclear weapons."

It quoted Kouchner telling Ha'aretz: "I honestly don't believe [a nuclear weapon] will give any immunity to Iran… First, because you [Israel] will hit them before. And this is the danger. Israel has always said it will not wait for the bomb to be ready. I think that [the Iranians] know. Everyone knows."

This is very blunt talk from the foreign minister of the country that currently holds the presidency of the European Union. And it further underscores the depth of concern that Europe, as well as Israel, has that Iran could acquire nuclear weapons – possibly within a year.

Iran is certainly not hiding its quest for nuclear power. In "Iran won't stop uranium enrichment" (Saskatoon StarPhoenix, Oct. 6) Reuters reported that Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki said Iran will not stop uranium enrichment even if it is guaranteed supplies of nuclear fuel from abroad.

This is a virtual admission that Iran is not interested in "peaceful" nuclear energy. It is clearly intent, despite its denials, on developing nuclear weapons.

Europe's growing awareness of the threat from Iran was highlighted in another Reuters piece, "NATO doubts world will stop Iran getting bomb" (Ynetnews.com, Oct. 6).

Reuters noted that NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer told a World Policy Conference in France that "he was not certain the world can stop Iran from building a nuclear bomb."

Reuters observed that the United Nations Security Council "last month again ordered Iran to 'comply fully and without delay' to demands it stop enrichment, but failed to introduce any new sanctions as sought by the United States and its western European allies."

The sanctions were vetoed by Russia, which may be planning, over strong Israeli objections, to sell Iran (and Syria) an advanced anti-aircraft missile system.

Reuters quoted Scheffer as saying: "My concern is that the Security Council, as we speak, is rather incapable of coming to further conclusions on further sanctions."

One consequence of the international failure to rein in Tehran is growing European support for Israel. Reuters reported: "As a result of Iran's nuclear activities, Scheffer said he would never expect Israel to abandon its own, 'supposed nuclear arsenal'… As we all know, Israel never admits to what it has, but I do not see very many arguments for the Jewish state to abandon its potential."

On a more positive note, CBC News: Sunday (Oct. 5) ran an inspiring story by Peter Armstrong about a diary kept by Israeli astronaut Ilan Ramon, who perished, along with six other crew members, when the space shuttle Columbia disintegrated in the atmosphere in 2003.

Armstrong described how remarkable it was that Ramon's diary survived the crash, given the conditions: "1,400 degrees during the explosion, -50 degrees cold once it entered the atmosphere, a 60-kilometre fall and the wind, sun and rain back on earth," landing "in of all places, Palestine, Texas."

Armstrong said: "Specialists at the Israel Museum, best known for preserving and restoring the Dead Sea Scrolls, pieced it back together."

Three pages of the diary are now on display at the museum, along with other famous documents that "connect thousands of years of Jewish history with modern Israel."

Armstrong concluded: "Jerusalem is a land of miracles and faith in the heavens. Ramon's book actually descended from the cosmos and miraculously survived, and it's somehow fitting it is on display here."

Limits on free speech explored

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

It's a debate that's been joined in Canada, off and on, for decades: to what extent, if any, should limits be imposed on free speech to protect minorities from vilification?

At the law offices of Cassels Brock & Blackwell, two proponents of laws that would restrict free expression clashed with a longstanding supporter of unfettered speech in a Sept. 25 lunchtime event sponsored by the Speakers Action Group and the Canadian Jewish Civil Rights Association.

Representatives of B'nai Brith Canada and the Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center (FSWC) pushed for retention of the anti-hate speech provisions of Canada's Human Rights Act and similar provincial legislation, while Alan Borovoy, general counsel of the Canadian Civil Liberties Association, said the law ought to be abandoned.

At the federal level, Section 13 of the Canadian Human Rights Act targets statements that are likely to expose people to hatred or contempt, based on prohibited grounds of discrimination, such as their religion.

"The first problem is, what the hell does hatred mean?" Borovoy asked. "Free speech is most important if it creates strong disapproval. Where does strong disapproval end and hatred begin?"

The legislation does not provide for the defence of truth, for lack of intent, or reasonableness of the statement, Borovoy said, suggesting that historian Daniel Goldhagen's argument that many Germans subscribed to Hitler's murderous anti-Semitism and were "willing executioners" could lead to hatred against Germans.

And if someone believes Serbs supported Slobodan Milosevic's atrocities against Kosovo and were willing executioners, would that not expose Serbs to hatred or contempt? And, Borovoy asked, should that view be censored?

"We want [the law] used against the people we don't like and not against the people we do like. Who do you trust to make that decision?" he asked.

"It's not as if that's the only weapon we have, and if we don't use it, we're powerless," he continued.

"This law undermines the value of free speech for our country. This law deprives us of a valuable weapon – speech with which we can denounce our enemies."

Borovoy said human rights commissions, which adjudicate complaints under Section 13, remain necessary to address discriminatory deeds, "not against unacceptable words."

Leo Adler, director of national affairs of the FSWC, said Canadians have decided to restrict free speech, and the Supreme Court of Canada has ruled that such a restriction is valid. The problem with Section 13 is "the way it's enforced."

The Canadian Human Rights Commission has asked University of Windsor law professor Richard Moon to study the provision. Controversy about the section's application was prompted by high-profile cases, one of which alleged that the mainstream magazine Maclean's ran an article by columnist Mark Steyn that promoted contempt of Muslims.

Adler said Canadians live in an "ABC world" of agencies, bureaus and commissions that limit our freedoms. Sometimes these institutions make mistakes. But so does the criminal justice system, and no one contemplates doing away with it, he said.

Adler argued the legislation targets only the most extreme cases, and 99.9 per cent of Canadians don't produce speech that approaches the venom found on hate websites. At most, 30,000 Canadians might be targeted by the section, he said.

Canada is a "cohesive, democratic society in which certain forms of behaviour, extreme as they are, will not be tolerated," he said.

David Matas, senior legal counsel for B'nai Brith, told the audience that "prohibition of hate speech is compatible with free speech."

Accepting that society will limit hate speech in some way, he said doing so under the auspices of human rights commissions is less draconian than under the Criminal Code. He pointed to a number of cases in which extremists were shut down after human rights complaints were launched, including New Brunswick teacher Malcolm Ross, former Aryan Nations spokesperson Terry Long in Alberta, and pro-Nazi propagandist Ernst Zundel in Toronto.

Matas acknowledged that "there are problems" with the system – including an ongoing "frivolous" complaint against B'nai Brith – but he said that they can be addressed through reforms.

Human rights commissions are likely to face an attempt by proponents of political Islam to further their agenda, he warned, adding human rights commissioners should be educated to meet that threat. He called for other reforms to the system, including awarding costs to the successful party and full disclosure of materials.

In a question period, Matas suggested that there is a direct link between incitement to hatred and the Holocaust, and that threats should be addressed while they are still considered "marginal."

Borovoy, however, said Matas was assuming "that only with these laws can you fight expressions of hatred and there is nothing else.

"Please don't assume that if you don't use laws like this you are powerless against hatemongers," Borovoy said.

High-profile figures such as former teacher Jim Keegstra and former native leader David Ahenakew were dealt with by losing their positions – Keegstra as a teacher and mayor of the Alberta town of Eckville, Ahenakew by being stripped of his Order of Canada.

Egyptian-born writer strong supporter of Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Nonie Darwish has come a long way from the values that surrounded her during her childhood in Egypt.

In her youth, Darwish was taught to hate Jews, fight the State of Israel and accept Sharīah (Islamic) law as the model for all societies. Today she counts herself as a strong supporter of Israel – she says proudly that her daughter is a Zionist – she opposes Shariah at every opportunity and she tries not to hate anyone.

There was no one incident, no conversion on the road to Damascus, that accounts for the profound shift in her life. She's often asked how could she make such a journey, particularly when her father – an Egyptian military commander – was killed by Israeli forces.

Darwish doesn't blink when she addresses that question. It's something she's thought about a lot over the years. She rejected the Islam of her youth and changed her views about Israel because she didn't want to lead a life full of hate, she said.

Darwish, who is married to a Christian and has lived in the United States for 30 years, was in Toronto recently as a guest of the Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center. During her visit, she spoke to several private gatherings, focusing on the issue of Shariah and jihad.

In an interview with The CJN, she expanded on her presentation, discussing the personal turmoil she experienced as a young girl when her father was killed. In the early 1950s, her father, Lt.-Col. Mustafa Hafaz, was stationed in Gaza, where he led the Egyptian military campaign against Israel. Hafaz organized bands of Palestinian terrorists who infiltrated Israel and killed civilians.

In response, Israel set up a team that assassinated Hafaz in July 1956, when Darwish was eight years old. Following her father's death, she recalled, Egyptian leader Gamel Abdel Nasser and an entourage came to the family's home to pay their respects. One of them – it may have been Nasser himself, she can't remember for sure – asked her brothers and sisters, "Which of you will avenge your father's death by killing Jews?"

Nonie Darwish

That question shocked her. "I didn't want to kill anybody," she said. "I couldn't forget this statement. It was with me a long time. It was a conflict in me. I have to hate them, but I didn't want to hate them."

Growing up in Cairo, it was easy to hate Jews. Egyptian culture was deeply immersed in anti-Semitism. It was all around. In the media, books, TV, movies. "I was brought up on anti-Semitism," Darwish said.

She points to several life experiences that contributed to the changes in her attitude over time.

After moving to the United States, "I befriended Jews, learned of their ethics, culture. I saw another side to the story."

In 1994, her brother in Gaza suffered a stroke. "All the Arabs around him decided whether to take him to a Gaza hospital or Hadassah Hospital [in Israel]. They all said, 'If you want him to live, take him to Hadassah Hospital.'"

Despite the propaganda they live with, Arabs trust Jews "in times of trouble… I saw another side to Israel and learned they treat a lot of Arabs," she said.

Still, the attitude toward Jews in the Middle East is toxic, she continued. After the 9/11 attacks, she felt devastated by the news that the ringleader was Mohamed Atta, an Egyptian. But when she phoned friends in Egypt she was told over and over again, "'Arabs did not do that. Don't you know it was a Jewish conspiracy?'

"I hung up the phone and started crying. I felt total disconnect with the culture of my origin."

About a year after 9/11, she began writing columns critical of Islamic extremism. She founded a website, Arabs for Israel (www.arabsforisrael.com) and is author of Now They Call Me Infidel: Why I Renounced Jihad for America, Israel, and the War on Terror.

By printing articles critical of Arab culture and the jihadist mindset of many Muslims – and by embracing Christianity – she has put her life in danger. Islamic law prescribes the death penalty for apostates like herself, she said.

A large percentage of Muslims in the United States support the imposition of Shariah (Muslim) law, she said. On her initial visit to a U.S. mosque, "the first thing I heard in the mosque was, 'Don't assimilate. We have to make Islam the law of the land.'"

Despite her critique of her native culture, Darwish said "I love my people. I love the Middle East. One of the reasons I am speaking is because I love my culture, but I believe terror is destroying the moral fabric of Arab societies."

Jane Goodall partners with University of Haifa

By ANNA MORGAN
Special to The CJN

Jane Goodall believes the world is at a crossroads and that the Middle East is an important part of the future.

Convinced that no one can simply be a bystander any longer, the renowned primatologist spends 300 days a year travelling, lecturing and encouraging youth involved in organizations such as the Jane Goodall Institute's Roots & Shoots, a global network of young people who work for environmental and humanitarian education and action.

On Nov. 16 at the Fairmont Royal York, the Jane Goodall Institute of Canada will partner with the Canadian Friends of Haifa University to host a fundraising dinner for Israel's first Roots & Shoots program.

Goodall will receive an honorary doctorate from the University of Haifa at the event.

"At this point, we need to acknowledge that the collective impact of millions of people making right decisions is huge. What we wear, what we eat – it all has an effect," Goodall said in a phone interview from New York, where she waiting for a flight to Australia.

Jane Goodall

Goodall, who became famous for her pioneering work with chimpanzees in the Gombe Stream in Tanzania, earned her PhD from Cambridge University in 1965.

Her discovery that chimps used wrapped leaves to fish termites from a nest debunked the belief that humans are the only species that uses tools, and it cemented Goodall's reputation as a major figure in the academic world. Goodall, along with Dian Fossey and Birute Galdikas, paved the way for many women to pursue careers in primatology.

In 1977, Goodall established the Jane Goodall Institute, which focused attention on the threatened African habitat of chimpanzees and other wildlife. In 1991, she perceived the need for a youth-focused initiative when a group of her students in Dar es Salaam, Tanzania, expressed a desire to become more actively involved in environmental and humanitarian issues.

She encouraged the students to form clubs in their schools. The idea took root and since then, the Jane Goodall Institute has helped more than 100,000 young people in almost 100 countries participate in programs.

In Canada, there are more than 10,500 young Canadians who have completed some 2,500 Roots & Shoots projects, such as collecting garbage in Montreal and rejuvenating rare oak trees in London, Ont.

Around the world, projects supported by the Jane Goodall Institute have helped students recycle telephone books in Shanghai, clear rubble from Nigerian roads and initiate HIV- and malaria-prevention programs in Kenya.

"Cross-border peace initiatives are particularly rewarding," Goodall said, noting that Roots & Shoots programs have been established in Congolese refugee camps in Tanzania, in northern Uganda and in Burundi with both Hutus and Tutsis.

"Initially, the young want to talk only about revenge on those who've killed their families. But by involving them in Roots & Shoots programs, they become immersed in their work and learn to understand that we're all part of one family," Goodall said.

"It's an incredible transformation. These kids become apolitical and learn to relate to each other through common projects," she added.

Goodall's initial connection to Israel began when an Israeli, Itai Rotman, became involved in one of her youth programs.

After seeing him work on various projects, the idea of forming an Israeli group was developed, and the University of Haifa emerged as the place to house the initiative.

As the most pluralistic institution of higher learning in Israel, the University of Haifa prides itself on bringing Jews, Arabs, new immigrants and Israel Defence Forces officers together in classrooms that promote tolerance and mutual respect.

Arab students comprise 20 per cent of the student body, which is equivalent to the proportion of the Arab population in Israeli society. In the 1970s, the university established the Jewish-Arab Centre to deal with the socio-academic needs of Arab students and to help increase understanding between Jews and Arabs on campus.

Recently, Israel's Ministry of the Environment recognized the University of Haifa as a "green campus" for its efforts to reduce pollution, increase water conservation, recycle and raise awareness of environmental issues.

Bringing Israeli and Palestinian students together to work on Roots & Shoots projects, which include environmental and conflict resolution programs, may not lead to peace right away, Goodall said.

But hopefully, the "proliferation of these kinds of projects will make a difference," she added.

Co-chairs of the Nov. 16 fundraiser are Diane Bald and Michael Budman and Denyse and Don Green. Honorary chair is environmentalist David Suzuki, and MC is CBC personality George Stroumboulopoulos. Special guests will include Dan Aykroyd, Norman Jewison, Eugene Levy and others from the entertainment world.

Proceeds from the dinner will also go toward establishing Jane Goodall scholarships in environmental studies at the University of Haifa and expanding Canadian Roots & Shoots programs.

Weizmann holds annual meeting

By LAURA STRICKER
Special to The CJN

She is a renowned scientist best known for her groundbreaking work on the structure of the ribosome.

She is also a recipient of the Wolf Prize in chemistry, an Israeli award that is often a precursor to winning a Nobel Prize, and she is the first Israeli to win a L'Oréal-UNESCO Award for Women in Science

But Prof. Ada Yonath says that her proudest achievement to date is being named "grandmother of the year" by her granddaughter.

Ada Yonath

As guest speaker at the 2008 Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science's national annual meeting, held last month in Toronto, Yonath gave an impassioned speech about the many years she has spent devoted to studying ribosomes – the combinations of ribonucleic acid and protein that are found in all cells – and why they cause certain types of bacteria to become resistant to antibiotics.

The walls of Yonath's office are covered from floor to ceiling in awards from many distinguished scientific organizations, but right in the centre is a hand-drawn award in a silver frame that reads: "The grandma of year is Ada Yonath!"

Society president and board chairman Jay Alan Smith opened up the meeting by talking about the society's accomplishments over the past year, including the launch of a new Calgary chapter; the Weizmann Women in Science program launching a chapter in Montreal, and raising close to $7 million, one of the society's best years ever.

He also discussed one of the society's charitable programs, the Birthday Angels, which, for a donation of $36, gives an underprivileged Israeli child a birthday party.

"In a 3-1/2-year period, we have funded over 1,500 birthday parties," Smith said proudly.

Marvin Tanner, the society's Montreal chair, discussed the Women of Science chapter, which was launched last year, saying it held many successful events, including a fashion fundraiser.

As well, a formal agreement was signed between McGill University and the Weizmann Institute. A conference was held September 2007, when 12 scientists from Weizmann came to Montreal. This year, a group of scientists from McGill will be travelling to Israel for a second conference.

These relationships between Israeli and Canadian scientists, and the work Weizmann has done to date, show that Weizmann scientists will be at the forefront of scientific discovery and innovation for a very long time, Smith said

Michael Shockett z"l

By Daniel Horowitz

s employees of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto made their way to the Lipa Green Building on Monday, September 29, their thoughts turned to celebrating Rosh Hashanah with friends and loved ones. However, as they filed into the building, they were soon presented with the unthinkable; the news that one of their own would not be participating in this, or any other, celebration again.

Michael Shockett, 52, who only days earlier was presented with an award by President and CEO Ted Sokolsky saluting his 25 years at UJA, had died along with his wife Cyndi two days earlier, as a result of a motorcycle accident on a Pennsylvania highway.

"What I remember most about Michael was his determination and dedication to get the job done no matter what the task required," says Bruce Gilbert, director of IT, and a 42-year veteran of UJA, who worked closely with Shockett. "That, coupled with his unique tongue-in-cheek humour, made a visit to your computer from Michael an event in an otherwise ordinary day for most people. He greeted each day with a smile and a 'good morning' and ended each day with a 'have a good evening', no matter how hectic the day might have been. He was truly a great person to work with. Michael will be sorely missed. He was a credit to our department, to UJA Federation and to the community."

A Frisbee enthusiast and a man who spent countless early mornings and lunches working out at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, Shockett was proud of his fitness level, and offered tips to many UJA Federation staffers.

Shockett was also proud to have been part of a recent trip he and wife Cyndi took. It was aboard the UJA Federation Israel education experience celebrating the country's 60th anniversary.

Miriam Shuval, a campaign associate with UJA Federation, was one of a few staff members working on that trip and, she says, Shockett's enthusiasm about being in Israel was hard to miss.

"I can recall a number of instances where Michael would climb off the beaten path, away from the group, and all of a sudden be halfway up a wall or hill, snapping pictures of the scenery which he thought was so beautiful and so unique," says Shuval. "He couldn't get over the beauty of the country, especially when it came to its architecture, sunsets, and people. Cyndi, I think, was just constantly amazed at the endless rich history of the country and wanted to be able to soak it all up. They both enjoyed an incredible experience together."

"I had the pleasure of going to Israel with Michael and Cyndi, and they both had the time of their lives," says long-time friend, and fellow UJA employee, Lil Nobel, who first met Michael 25 years ago when the Federation was located on Toronto's Beverley Street. "Back then, Michael was known for his wild, bushy red hair and his reputation for being a perfectionist. Ironically, Michael was probably the safest motorcyclist around. Before he'd get on his bike, he would always check it twice. I can honestly say that as a friend I loved Michael and Cyndi and I will miss them both so much."

"I knew Michael for close to 20 years, and he was just such a special guy," says UJA Federation assistant campaign director, Mark Freedman. "I have great memories of our motorcycle rides, especially those to Niagara-on-the-Lake. My 21-year-old son Jesse was incredibly fond of both Michael and Cyndi. He was really devastated by the news. They were a wonderful couple who touched so many lives and they will be missed."

"Michael grew up in the UJA family, starting out – literally – in the mailroom – as his talents and responsibilities grew with the growth of the organization," says Sokolsky. "With each new wave of technology Michael was there to help lead the way and work with his colleagues in adjusting to the rapid changes in the workplace. Above all, he cared about his peers and made sure that everyone was treated with dignity and respect. I know that the trip to Israel with Cyndi this past winter, arranged by UJA Federation in recognition of his 25 years of service to the community, was very meaningful and exciting for him. Just before he passed away he was telling me how important that trip was for the two of them. It's going to be very difficult imagining life at Lipa Green without Michael. He will be missed by all of us."

North Winnipeg shul celebrates 100 years

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Chevra Mishnayes Synagogue in north Winnipeg celebrates its 100th anniversary in early November with an evening of dessert, dancing and schmoozing.

"The evening is serving a dual purpose," says Rob Waldman, the synagogue's vice-president. "Not only are we celebrating our 100th anniversary, but we are also hoping to raise enough money to install an elevator in the shul. Our present building was built in the mid-'60s before access became an issue. It's harder for some of our older people to go up and down the stairs."

The Chevra Mishnayes has never had a rabbi or full-time paid staff. Still, the synagogue continues to flourish in spite of the steady decrease in the number of Jewish residents in north Winnipeg.

Waldman says the synagogue's ability to keep on going reflects the strong sense of family and chevra that has always been fostered there. "To my mind, it's all about continuity," he says.

His family have been members since 1926, while current president Marshall Kneller is the fourth generation in his family to be part of the shul.

The congregation began in a house in the old north end in 1908, and a short time later, moved into its first building at Stella and Robinson, where most of Winnipeg Jewry lived at the time. In the early 1960s, the city expropriated the land for a low-cost housing development. Led by men such as then-president Dave Leven; Shia Steinberg (comedian David Steinberg's father); Rob's uncle, Bert Waldman; Pesach Coodin and Joe Margulius, the congregation rebuilt at its current location in Winnipeg's Garden City area, where many members of the Jewish community were moving.

For 10 years, Leven served as president and daily minyan organizer. He would often pick up most of the men for the minyans. He was succeeded in his dual roles by Bert Waldman, who served as president and minyan organizer for 25 years. Also playing an important role in the synagogue's life for many years were Jack Fishman, formerly of Sault Ste Marie and Thunder Bay; the late Jack Dubovsky; and Gerry Dorfman. In 1980, the congregation welcomed Gerry Daien as its cantor, a role he fills to this day.

In 1971, the members of another north end congregation, Ohel Jacob, closed its doors and merged with Chevra Mishnayes.

After ill health forced Bert Waldman to step aside in the mid-1990s, a number of younger members of the congregation – people in their late 30s and early 40s at the time – stepped forward to assume leadership.

"There is a corps of five of us who run the shul now," says past president Grant Zipursky, Daien's son-in-law. The group consists of Zipursky; Marshall Kneller; Kneller's wife, Leah, who is secretary; Waldman; and treasurer Murray Greenfield.

"I'm sure that many of our shul members are unaware of how much the members of the executive do," Waldman says. "We participate in the services, clean up after weddings and bar mitzvahs, and Murray and I just finished polishing the pews."

Five years ago, the longtime Orthodox congregation voted to allow mixed seating. "It was a tough issue," Waldman says. "We polled our members twice. We even contacted all the people who only come for yom tov. In the end, 70 per cent voted in favour of mixed seating."

Three years ago, the congregation spent $50,000 to upgrade its kitchen with state-of-the-art appliances.

The congregation currently numbers about 100 members and member families. For yom tov, the synagogue consistently attracts about 250 people, including many younger families – it is the third largest congregation in the city in terms of holiday attendance. Capacity is close to 470.

Downstairs is the kitchen, a small chapel and an auditorium that can seat a maximum of 235 for life cycle events and synagogue functions.

"We have a lot of fun here," Waldman says. "For many of us, the Chevra Mishnayes feels like an extension of our homes and families."

Graves of lust

IDEAS ON IDENTITY

By Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

Caveat emptor: I am a vegetarian, and I have been for 30 years. So is my husband, and so are my three teenaged boys, since birth, and now by adult choice. So is my husband's brother, my sister-in-law and all five of their kids. So if I add my voice to the chorus of rabbis and community leaders about the Agriprocessors scandal, it's only to ask the most obvious – at least to me – questions, the ones that have not yet been asked.

Why are people so incensed over the ethical injustices of only one particular slaughterhouse? Why not talk about the whole meat industry? Why not talk about how our appetite for meat justifies, sustains and ensures the growth of places such as Agriprocessors?

Because that one is kosher, you say, and kosher means ethical, clean and proper, you think. But as many kashrut supervisors and halachic defenders have argued, some in the pages of this newspaper, "kosher" is only a narrow legal category of how animals are killed, not how they live; how they are slaughtered, not how they are treated.

"Kosher" is a matter of how sharp the knife is. It's "technically" not about the welfare of the people who yield the knife. It doesn't matter if the meat is organic, fair-trade, healthy or sustainable. It doesn't matter if it's processed to the point of being unrecognizable, or if its manufacture destroys small farms, or if its factory pollutes the environment.

A chemical-laden concoction with no ingredients you can pronounce is technically "kosher" as long as it meets the proscribed halachic requirements of its category. So for example, broccoli with bugs is not OK, but broccoli with poisonous pesticides and picked by oppressed migrant workers is OK. I've read countless authoritative kashrut councils and halachic decisors who have decided not to "overstep boundaries" by asking ethical questions about halachic situations. Since when do we separate Halachah from ethics?

In the Torah, the grumbling Israelites beg for meat after a steady diet of manna. When the quails rain down, they stuff themselves with meat until they die. That place of meat-craving is called kivrot hata'avah, graves of lust. That's what Agriprocessors is, and what every other slaughterhouse is, kosher or not. Be brave and go see for yourself. Its not Tevye's few happy chickens being killed for Shabbat, believe me. Its a multi-million-dollar breeding and slaughtering machine, and it doesn't stop for a minute to look around not only at the animals it takes but at the land, water and resources it uses and at the environment it spills its waste into.

I applaud the Conservative movement's bold initiative to expand the boundaries of kashrut certification to include ethical considerations, and the Reform movement's recent vote to support it. I applaud the brave Israeli modern Orthodox group Bemaaglei Tzedek, which initiated a kosher certification called Tav Chevrati – meaning "Society's Seal" – which it will give only to restaurants that both provide disabled access and pay their workers fairly. I hear that in young people in Jerusalem, both religious and not, will no longer patronize bars and cafes that have not earned this certification.

A small grocer in my neighborhood recently mused to me that "local is the new organic." Bravo to those who insist that "ethical" is the new "kosher."

The real root of the crisis

Money Matters

By Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

"Whomever has 100 desires 200" our Sages declared, with their keen insight into human nature. Tragically, we are witness to those who have one million yet are not satisfied until they have tens of millions, at which point they are not satisfied until they have hundreds of millions, at which point… This, in a nutshell, is the cause of the turmoil in world financial markets that threatens to reshape our economy in ways not yet known and in ways that we do not want to know.

None of this is an accident. It's rooted in basic human greed and the adage, "Let's make more money now and worry about the consequences later." Credit was made available in the United States by giving loans at below market rates to those who lacked the necessary income. It was hoped that by the time the banks demanded higher rates to compensate for their initial losses, these people would somehow be able to afford payments that they could not when they received the initial loan. But hope is no way to run a business. This shortsighted focus explains the preoccupation by shareholders and management alike with quarterly results instead of more crucial long-term goals.

With trillions of dollars at risk worldwide, the stakes are enormous, forcing massive government intervention in the markets, something fundamentally at odds with the notion of a free market. Federal regulators in the United States have begun investigating top executives to see if they knew that huge losses were imminent and misled the public by not reporting it.

The obligation to prevent harm to others is a fundamental principle of Jewish law, so much so that we are allowed to speak disparagingly of others – to speak lashon hara – if that's the only way to prevent "others" from causing us harm. We have an obligation to inform others of impending losses as soon as we become aware of them. This would include layoffs of staff, lack of regulatory approval for a medical product or losses of major contracts.

It is exceedingly rare for a company to go bankrupt unexpectedly – usually, the signs are evident well beforehand. It's not unheard of for top executives to arrange their affairs – using legal technicalities or otherwise – to minimize their own losses before filing for bankruptcy.

Yet, at times, revealing "bad news" just makes matters worse, preventing measures from being negotiated that could reverse or at least halt the negative fallout. There is much room for secret negotiations away from the glare of the media and Wall Street when companies are in distress. Intent, however, is crucial. One may not enter into secret talks to forestall the inevitable, but rather to salvage the best possible deal. Admittedly, the line is sometimes fine, making corporate values crucial.

Just like love, money has the capability to blind us to reality. It's quite clear why the Torah has more mitzvot related to monetary issues that any other area of Jewish life – more than Shabbat, the holidays, kashrut and Israel. We need constant reminders and guidelines to ensure that our pursuit of money remains a means to an end, not an end in itself.

Many of the Al chets that we recite on Yom Kippur relate to our shortcomings in this crucial area. Yom Kippur is followed immediately by Sukkot, when we celebrate our material blessings represented by the Four Species. Yet it's precisely at this time that we are forced to leave our homes, indicating the fleeting nature of material possessions – preferring to dwell under the Divine "canopy of peace." Sukkot, with its emphasis on material moderation, is known as Zman Simchateinu, the time of happiness.

Hakhel – all together now

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

It was one of the biggest acts of togetherness in Jewish history. In the days of the Temple, Jews would converge on Jerusalem to fulfil a commandment that could only be performed once every seven years: the mitzvah of Hakhel, the assembly of the Jewish people. If the Temple were standing today, that's where we'd probably be during this special week. Although the mitzvah of Hakhel is not in force today, many people have put a modern twist on a 2,000-year-old tradition. Today, a look at Hakhel on the web.

We have just completed the shmittah or Sabbatical year during which the land in Israel lies fallow and debts between Jews are forgiven. [tinyurl.com/shemita] As described in Deuteronomy, during the festival of Sukkot following the shmittah year, Moses commanded the priests and elders to perform what is considered an incredible act of Jewish unity, to "assemble [Hakhel] the people – the men, the women, the small children… in order that they will hear and they will learn… and observe to do all the words of this Torah." [tinyurl.com/hakhel13]

And quite a ceremony it was. Trumpets would sound throughout Jerusalem, and a large wooden platform would be erected on Temple grounds. The king would sit on the platform, and all in attendance would gather around him. Torah scrolls would be handed from dignitary to dignitary until they were presented to the king, who would read selections to the assembled nation. [en. wikipedia.org/wiki/hakhel]

The Temples were destroyed. Jewish sovereignty ended. Although there is no longer a formal obligation to observe Hakhael, some Jews continued to commemorate the mitzvah into the Middle Ages. Eliezer Segal continues the story. "It is difficult not to be amazed by the sheer tenacity of this ancient rite, and by our ancestors' determination to keep it alive for so long after the destruction of the Temple. Though there are many possible reasons for the phenomenon, I feel that much of the Hakhel gathering's attraction stemmed from the way in which it gave tangible expression to that most evasive of ideals: the unity of the Jewish people." [tinyurl.com/hakhel14]

Flash forward several centuries to October 1952. Citizens of the young State of Israel have just observed the sabbatical year and Time magazine was on hand to describe the country's first Hakhel: "Last week, the shmittah was over. Ten thousand pilgrims, most of them newly arrived immigrants from the Middle East, marched to the top of Mount Zion, where they celebrated the end of the seventh year – the ceremony of Hakhel – for the first time since King Agrippa presided over the rites in 42 CE. This year, since none of the Israeli government leaders is strictly Orthodox, the head of the state was represented by Jerusalem's chief cantor, who read the Torah from the top of a truck. As he finished, old men blew on the double ram's-horn. Pilgrims wearing rich prayer shawls cried out in jubilation, dancing and clapping their hands to the jangling of tambourines." [tinyurl.com/hakhel01]

The organization Panim for Jewish Renaissance doesn't wait for every seventh year to celebrate a type of Hakhel. Each Sukkot, the Efal Seminary near Ramat Gan plays host to the Hakhel Festival of Jewish Learning. More than 4,000 people, "secular and religious, young and old, veteran Israelis and new immigrants" celebrate "Jewish pluralistic culture" through study sessions, panel discussions, lectures, as well as through music, plays, dance and film. [tinyurl.com/hakhel15]

One of the greatest proponents of a modern-day tribute to Hakhel was the Lubavitcher Rebbe. In order to emphasize the importance of unity during this special year, the Rebbe would depart from his normal custom and hold the etrog, palm, myrtle and willow together throughout the entire Hallel service. Those four species – needed to fulfil the mitzvah of lulav – are commonly thought to represent Jews, very different yet reliant on each other for survival. [tinyurl.com/hakhel17]

Can't make it to Jerusalem this Hakhel year? You can still demonstrate your Hakhel-affinity. Chabad Israel has created a "Hakhel card" in which you can pledge to organize an activity that brings Jews together. [tinyurl.com/hakhel1]

JNF sends kids of military families to Israel

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Some of the money raised at last year's Jewish National Fund's Negev Gala here were earmarked for a new JNF project to send children of Canadian military families to visit Israel, in part as an expression of solidarity with the Canadian Armed Forces and our role in Afghanistan.

The first group, consisting of 30 participants age 16 to 21 and three chaperones, recently returned from Israel.

"Everyone was really excited," says Christine Brine, one of the chaperones and the co-ordinator of the trip.

Sarah Sauve, from Kingston, N.S., was looking forward to experiencing a different culture and climate. "Israel was amazing," says the Grade 12 student whose father has served in the military for 20 years. "It's a beautiful country."

Sauve says she really enjoyed Tel Aviv and a visit to a Bedouin camp. "The camel ride was also cool," she adds.

Among the highlights of the trip for chaperone Eric MacKenzie, who is also from Nova Scotia, were floating in the Dead Sea and watching the sun rise while standing at the top of Masada.

"I had no idea Israel was so tropical," says the 24-year-old Canadian Armed Forces civilian employee – MacKenzie is the Wing 14 community recreational co-ordinator. "I was also surprised to see so much development in such a small area."

This was Brine's second visit to Israel. Eight years ago, she toured the country as part of a performing arts group from Grant Park High School in south Winnipeg. "I hadn't been north the last time," she comments. "We really got a good idea of how close everything is in that area."

Brine, who works out of CFB 17 Wing in Winnipeg, says the participants for the trip were chosen based on essays they submitted. They also had to commit to 40 hours of community volunteer work.

In Israel, the group, which included children of Canadian military families stationed in Belgium as well as in Afghanistan, first toured Jerusalem, and then headed south to Latrun, Be'er Sheva and the Yatir forest and water reservoir. They also visited other JNF projects in the area. They rode camels in Kfar Nokdim, where they spent the night.

During their visit, the group climbed Masada, then visited Ein Gedi en route to Tel Aviv.

In Tel Aviv, they met with the Canadian ambassador at the embassy and spent the weekend enjoying the city. They were also present at the inauguration of the nearby Canadian Military Park and stopped in Haifa before flying back to Canada.

"This was one of the most useful and beneficial projects that I have ever been associated with," says businessman and philanthropist Arnold Frieman, a Holocaust survivor and a veteran of Israel's War of Independence, who was the honoree at the 2007 JNF Negev Gala where this project was initiated.

Correction

Last week's report on the all-parties debate at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation ("Candidates make their pitches at shul forum," CJN, Oct. 10) referred to CJPAC as the sole organizer of the event. In fact, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the Canada-Israel Committee and Canadian Jewish Congress were also co-sponsors. The CJN regrets the omissions.

Kitchener shul celebrates centennial

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Call it the little shul that could.

For 100 years, Congregation Beth Jacob in Kitchener, Ont., has stood the test of time, uniting the small but active Jewish community there and keeping traditions alive while other small-town congregations have come and gone.

On Oct. 26, the Orthodox congregation at 161 Stirling Ave. will celebrate its centennial with a gala evening featuring addresses by local politicians and University of Waterloo president David Johnston.

Invitations have been extended to both current and ex-members, and organizers estimate the event will be a sellout, with 250 people attending.

Howie Budd, a past-president of the shul, told The CJN that there are currently some 130 local Jewish families plus "30 out-of-towners" who frequent the Beth Jacob.

"This synagogue is the focal point for Jewish life between Windsor, Ont., and Toronto," Budd said. "We're the last bastion for the small-town Jewish community."

Among other things, the shul boasts a full-time Talmud Torah, an adult education program and the ability to provide "a real sense of community," he said.

Though membership is not what it used to be – the current building on Stirling Street was constructed in the 1960s to accommodate more than 500 congregants – the influx of businesses to the region – most notably Blackberry maker Research In Motion – and the University of Waterloo have helped lure more young people and families to Kitchener-Waterloo.

That bodes well for a resurgence of interest in the shul, said co-president Larry Matlow.

"Our challenge now is to find the unaffiliated [Jews] and show them we have something to offer," he said. "A lot of Israelis are moving to the area, too."

According to Beth Jacob historical documents, the city's original Jewish community was tiny, and the congregation first convened in a local home circa 1900.

But by 1908, the community had built a "stately" synagogue made of "beautiful carved wood and stained glass windows," which was used for decades before it was eventually abandoned for the current, more utilitarian building in 1961.

Over the years, Beth Jacob's congregation has had a hand in many historical initiatives in the community, including sponsoring Holocaust survivors to come to the area – many of whom helped contribute to the town's rich, Jewish mercantile district of the downtown core in the 1950s – as well as sponsoring the arrival of Vietnamese boat people in the 1970s and of Russian Jews in the 1980s.

The congregation has also made significant contributions to the political and academic life of the region.

Congregants Harold Paikin and Morley Rosenberg served as mayors of Waterloo and Kitchener, respectively – Paikin in the late 1950s and Rosenberg in the early 1980s.

In 2001, Beth Jacob members were "instrumental in establishing a chair of Jewish studies" at the University of Waterloo, according to the shul's literature.

The 100th anniversary will be a celebration of the community's longstanding involvement in Kitchener-Waterloo and a reaffirmation of Beth Jacob's place as a "warm and inviting congregation," Budd said.

"We have an obligation to keep this going for another 100 years," Budd said.

Beth Jacob's well-respected, full-time spiritual leader, Rabbi Yosil Rosenzweig, who hails from Windsor, Ont., is as unique as his shul.

Prior to his current pulpit, Rabbi Rosenzweig served as a chaplain in three New York state prisons. He's also a notable musician – he won awards for his compositions in the 1977 and 1980 Israeli Chassidic Song Festivals – and was the owner of Yosil's Deli and Restaurant, an American-style deli in Israel.

"In Kitchener, the congregation is the Jewish lifeline of the community. We don't have the street culture of a Bathurst Street," he said.

Rabbi Rosenzweig said the next challenge facing the small Kitchener-Waterloo Jewish community is in rallying all the "disenfranchised" Jewish families in the area and getting them to unite as a group.

"There are probably 200 families here who still belong to their home synagogues, either in Toronto or elsewhere," Rabbi Rosenzweig said. "The first 100 years started off with Jews who were like-minded. The future of our Jewish community depends on a unity program. It's time we come together and unite the community's various factions."

ICRF holds awards luncheon

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The first annual Men of Distinction Luncheon sponsored by Israel Cancer Research Fund (ICRF) raised close to $350,000 for cancer research in Israel.

The award will be presented each year to individuals who exhibit philanthropic leadership and commitment in their communities and beyond.

Honorees were Jim Balsillie, co-CEO at Research in Motion, maker of the BlackBerry wireless handheld system; and Dr. David Malkin, staff oncologist, senior scientist and associate chief of research (clinical) at the Hospital for Sick Children and professor of pediatrics at the University of Toronto.

Balsillie, in 2002, founded and endowed Canada's largest foreign policy think-tank, the Centre for International Governance Innovation, which addresses international governance challenges.

In 2007, he founded the Balsillie School of International Affairs, and also founded and chairs the Canadian International Council, Canada's council of foreign relations.

Malkin maintains a clinical practice in the treatment of children with cancer, and among other things, he has created the cancer genetics program at SickKids that addresses clinical and ethical issues in cancer predisposition in children, is a member of the medical advisory board of the Leukemia and Lymphoma Society of Canada and a past member of the ICRF scientific review panels. He is also medical director of Camp Oochigeas, a recreational program for children with cancer.

In accepting his award, Malkin said he devotes his volunteer time to groups that dream, including the Weizmann Institute of Science and ICRF.

Study finds hormone therapy decreases risk of some cancers

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Hormone replacement therapy for postmenopausal women with the BRCA1 genetic mutation lowers their risk of breast cancer by 42 per cent, an international study has found.

The study was led by Dr. Steven Narod of Women's College Hospital, who is the Canada Research Chair in Breast Cancer, program director of the familial breast cancer research unit at Women's College Research Institute and professor of public health sciences at University of Toronto.

As reported in Journal of the National Cancer Institute, the study looked at 472 women, out of a pool of 9,000 women with the gene mutation, who had gone into early menopause as a result of prophylactic surgery or for other reasons.

Research was carried out in five European centres, 19 in the United States and 19 in Canada, including Saskatoon, Edmonton, London, Montreal (at McGill University), Hamilton, Kingston, Halifax and Toronto's Princess Margaret, Sunnybrook, Womens College and Mount Sinai hospitals, Narod said.

Some women, especially younger ones, who are especially at risk for breast or ovarian cancer if they carry the BRCA1 or BRCA2 gene mutations, deal with the risk by having their breasts or ovaries removed. This puts them into menopause, Narod said, with the accompanying mood swings and psychological effects.

Hormone replacement therapy (HRT), either estrogen alone or an estrogen-progesterone combination, can decrease or prevent these side effects.

An earlier study warned that statistically, HRT can, in fact, lead to an increased chance of getting breast cancer. Narod's study, however, found that in those with the gene mutations, it can reduce the risk and maintain quality of life.

This study is particularly important for Ashkenazi Jewish women, among whom there is a much greater incidence of the BRCA1 and BRCA2 mutations.

Narod stressed that "this is a first study. [To be definitive] the results need to be replicated."

Womens College Hospital Foundation is honouring Narod with a special event called Real to Reel – Facing Breast Cancer: Living with BRCA1. It is scheduled for Oct. 29 at the Manulife Centre Cineplex Odeon Theatre.

The evening will begin at 5 p.m. with a wine and hors d'oeuvres reception, followed at 5:45 by the screening of In The Family, a documentary about a family dealing with having the BRCA1 gene mutation.

After the film, a panel, including Narod; Dr. John Semple, the Women's College Hospital's chief of surgery; and a genetic counsellor, will answer questions from the audience.

The cost is $108. Registration is through the website, womenscollegehospitalfoundation.ca, by telephone at 416-323-6323 or by e-mail at foundation@wchospital.ca. Proceeds will go toward supporting Narod's seminal work in predictive genetic testing.

Doctor to be honoured on October 29

Emerson Fellows defend Israel on campus

By RIVA GOLD
Special to The CJN

StandWithUs has big plans this year to revitalize Israel's image at Concordia University, York University, the University of Victoria and 37 other campuses across North America.

The international educational organization has trained select students as Emerson Fellows to make university campuses more Israel-friendly.

The Emerson Fellowship, now in its second year, empowers students attending universities with strong anti-Israel sentiment to become stronger advocates for Israel through the support of philanthropists Rita and Steve Emerson.

"My first year at York was a big eye-opener for me when it came to the intensity of anti-Israel propaganda on campus," said Anna Neuman, the Emerson Fellow at York.

"I remember the first time I walked through Vari Hall [York's main entrance] and saw the Israeli Apartheid Wall," an exhibit erected by anti-Israel campus groups.

Neuman plans to use the training and expertise she gained from the program to help all supporters of Israel voice their opinions safely on campus.

In September, she helped bring Amir Gissin, Israel's consul general in Toronto, to York to discuss the concept of "rebranding" the image of Israel both on and off campus.

At Concordia, Emerson Fellow Samantha Banks, who is also president of Hillel Montreal, hopes to eradicate misconceptions about Israel in the student community.

"Concordia's well-documented history [of conflict] does not reflect the current climate on campus," Banks said.

"We have established a much more comfortable and secure environment, and I want to show new and old students alike how vibrant and expressive we are today."

Banks' plans include a mock UN Security Council, meetings with election candidates, and positive marketing campaigns such as Tel Aviv 100.

At UVic, Matan Levanon, who lived in Israel until age 22, aims to inform the broader community about Israel's contributions to the world.

"Coming to Canada from Israel, I was taken by how much the situation in the Middle East affects Canadian Jews, but I also noticed a lack of knowledge. I want to help students educate themselves about issues regarding Israel, and not just the conflict," Levanon said.

"I would also love to see a growing involvement by the entire campus community and not only by Jewish students."

This year, Levanon hopes to initiate a "World Awareness Week," covering hot topics around the world, such as environmental sustainability, with an emphasis on Israel's contribution to each field.

StandWithUs has assisted each of the fellows by providing them with financial support and training in California to learn how to fight anti-Israel rhetoric and stereotypes.

Speakers were also brought in to discuss coalition building, event planning and even media training.

"I was surrounded by very dynamic students and speakers from across North America," Neuman said of her training experience.

"It was a great opportunity to share our experiences of Israel activism on campus and exchange ideas too," she added.

"For many students, especially from Canada, this was their first rally or protest," explained Dani Klein, StandWithUs' campus director.

"I think we were able to send a message out to the world leaders at the UN."

StandWithUs has also teamed up with the Jerusalem Post to produce Campus Post, a new, free monthly publication distributed with the Jerusalem Post and on university campuses.

"Jerusalem Post writers contribute articles about Israeli culture, society, and current events, while students and campus professionals write articles concerning the face of Israel advocacy here in North America, and on campus," Klein said.

Hockey: a "special" expense?

Family Matters
by
John Syrtash
B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Counsel
Garfin Zeidenberg LLP
Family Lawyer & Mediator for 26 years

Question: I pay my proportionate share (70 percent) of my younger child's day care expenses, my older child's orthodontic bills and summer camp. After my $927 in monthly child support and $1,000 in monthly spousal payments, our "net disposable incomes" are about the same, equalized.

My older boy has just started playing competitive hockey as a goalie: $1,500 in expensive goalie equipment, winter and summer hockey camp schools, an expensive hockey league, uniforms, travel expenses around the province — the works. His mother says this is not part of the child's normal expenses that she should have to bear on her own. She claims the Child Support Guidelines allows her to ask me to share this expense as "special and extraordinary." I say it's part of her regular expenses since most boys play hockey in this country. I'm now remarried with a new child and a second family. Am I not paying enough already?

Answer: In Ontario, unlike some other provinces, a Judge would likely order you to contribute to at least part of the hockey expenses in proportion to your respective gross incomes: 70%. Much depends on how much the total of these expenses impacts on your budget and your former wife's. Under Canadian law, having a second family in itself does not excuse you from your obligation to your first family. If there were a number of such extracurricular activities for both children and if the expenses seriously interfered with your ability to pay your bills after your other support payments, then a Judge would likely hesitate or would at least reduce the level of your contribution. However, in a number of reported cases, depending on the facts, such as a higher table amount, Judges have refused to order contributions for normal extracurricular activities on the basis they are already covered by basic payment.

For instance, in one reported case, a Judge ordered that the husband would not have to contribute to skating lessons but would have to pay towards the special travel costs of the child's skating competition overseas. Under section 7 of the Child Support Guidelines, much depends on the facts of each case: the number of children, the income of each of the parents, who has what kind of custody, the type of expense, which province, and whether the expense was paid for at the time of separation. For any specific situation, call my assistant Karen and ask about my "Section 7 Extraordinary Expense Database." חדשה בקנדה

"יש לי תחושה שהגענו למקום שנותן כבוד לאנשים." אמרתי לבעלי, "עזבי אותך מכבוד." הוא סיכם, "אני מתגעגע לאמא שלי..."

"אמא!" טונה אלי בתי בת השמונה כשאנו ישובים בקניון ההומה חוללים קצת ג'אנק, בשביל הנשמה.

בעלי ואני מתבלבלים.

"את סבתא?" אני חוזרת "סבתא בתל אביב, מתוקה."

"שמעתי שבקנדה יש קהילה יהודית נהדרת," המשיך, "וגם נורא כיף שם. הכל גדול ועושר כזה."

"אבל אני נורא אוהבת חורף." אמרתי לבעלי כשאנחנו פוסעים לעבר הגלים, להירגע קצת מהחום המעיק של החוף. "ואני נורא רוצה לחוות שלם, לראות מקומות, להכיר אנשים פחות עצבנים." צחק בעלי כשהוא מחזיר כדור גומי שהושלך לעבר מצחו מקבוצה משתוללת של נערים משולהבים.

"יש לי תחושה שהגענו למקום שנותן את הכבוד לכל אינדיבידואל." התפייטתי למאיר בעלי, שמצידו ראה את הדברים בצורה רומנטית הרבה פחות.

WOMEN HONOURED: Karen Mock, left, former national director of the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada and of the Canadian Race Relations Foundation, and Barbara Landau, co-chair of the Canadian Association of Jews and Muslims, were honoured as "eminent women of peace" by the Canadian Department of Peace Initiative and Voices of Women (VOW) on Oct. 2 in Ottawa. Defining the hipster Jew for the new generation

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

On Sept. 1, award-winning U.S. journalist and proud Heebster maven Lisa Alcalay Klug released her book Cool Jew: The Ultimate Guide for Every Member of the Tribe (Andrews McMeel Publishing).

Described as "a field manual for 21st-century Jews and the people who love them, [it] decodes contemporary Judaism and its hippest forms of cultural expression," Cool Jew is 250 pages of new Jewish lingo and imagery and has been on Amazon.com's Top 10 bestseller list for humour/religion since its release. It's now in its second print run due to heavy demand, according to Klug.

Though she's been living out of a suitcase for the last month while promoting the book on a whirlwind North American tour, Klug kindly took time out for an e-mail Q&A last week with Heebonics to kibbitz about how it came together and her thoughts on the new Jew. Now that's menschkeit.

And before you ask, Klug has decided to coin the term "Heebster," defining it as such:

Heebster \heeb-stur\, noun (circa now) :
1 : A cool Jew.
2 : An honorary Member of the Tribe.
3 : Those who not only know what it is to be Jewish, they know it, flaunt it, dig it and love it.

Heebonics: Why write Cool Jew?
Klug: I wrote Cool Jew because I love being Jewish and I care passionately about how we relate to our identity, tradition and community.
H: How did you go about researching it? How long did it take?
K: About 15 years crammed into two. I've been collecting and noticing fun and innovative forms of Jewish expression for a long time. I spent a much shorter period actually writing the book, gathering images, working with an illustrator, designing the cover and working on the layout. I share the design credit on the book.
H: On your dedication page you write that without your parents "I might never have known I am Jewish." Can you explain?
K: Are you kidding me? I was kidding you! Like all good jokes, there is truth to this one. Why else would any sane toddler start eating gefilte fish?
H: You come from a "mixed" marriage, Ashkenazi and Sephardi. How would you describe your Jewish upbringing?
K: We followed a lot of my father's Ashkenazi traditions and ate a lot of my mother's favourite tropical fruits. My school lunches were weird combinations like gefilte fish and coconut. In other words, our home was a cultural Cuisinart.

My dad's accent is a lot like Dr. Ruth's and my mom's is more like Ricky Ricardo. My book is in no way autobiographical, but once you know my background, you can read some of that between the lines.

H: Your book seems directed at a North American Jewish youthful demographic somewhere between ages 18 and 40. Is this the "Heebster" range as you see it?
K: The book has garnered amazing response from all ages, from teens to octogenarians. And as it happens, many Jewish organizations have been inviting me to share Cool Jew with groups ranging from teens to 20s, 30s and 40s.

But I'm also speaking to women's divisions and Hadassah. As I say in the book's introduction, it doesn't matter if you're old or young, a true Heebster is ageless.
H: Did you speak to any Canadian Heebsters in the making of your book? (We have some nice gefilte fish up here, you know.)
K: So I've heard. I'm looking forward to sampling it on my Canada tour. I love the music of [Montrealer] Socalled [a.k.a. Josh Dolgin] and enjoyed shmoozing with him during his tours of the Lower 48. Now that's one fresh Heebster.

I'm also a fan of the Hunderts, Rabbi Leibish and Dena, at the Ghetto Shul in Montreal. I met them at the Jewlicious festivals, and we're planning a Montreal launch party for Cool Jew on Oct. 30.

(Note: Klug will throw a launch party and book signing for Cool Jew in Toronto at Indigo in Yorkdale Shopping Centre on Nov. 2 and has a scheduled book event at the Koffler Centre of the Arts on Nov. 3.)

H: How old are you?
K: A true Heebster is ageless. Didn't I just say that?
H: What stream of Judaism do you subscribe to? Orthodox/Reform/Conservative/Reconstructionist/other?
K: You might say I'm an Ashekfardic Neo-Chasidish Carlebachian Shomeret Shabbat Post-Labelficationist Sheebster... You know, the usual.
H: You have an extensive writing/journalism portfolio. How has your work as a journalist influenced your own Heebsterism?
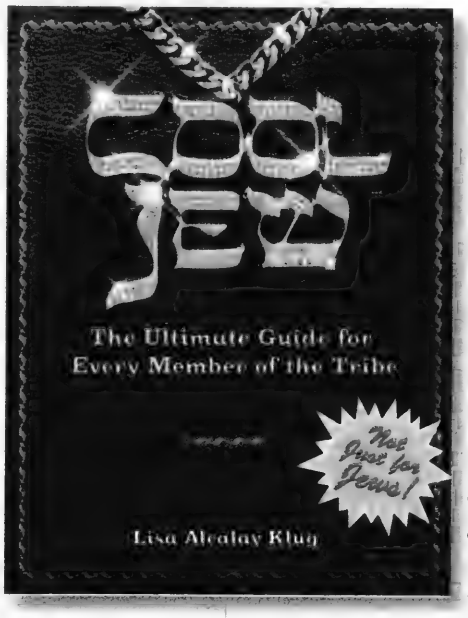
K: First of all, thanks, Heebro. And for shizzy, I've spent years covering Jewish topics, travelling to Jewish communities around the world, spending time in Israel, and writing up Jewish museums, artists, historic sites, newsmakers, festivals, launch parties and much more.



It's led me to some amazing experiences, judging the Simply Manischewitz Cook-Off, teaching at the Jewlicious festivals, attending the Downtown Seder [held annually at the Knitting Factory in New York] and broadened my understanding of what it means to be a cool Jew. When you're a Heebster, you don't have to work hard to be cool. You just got to be Jew.

H: Where do you currently reside? Where did you grow up?
K: I grew up in Southern California. I currently live in a suitcase and can be found at www.cooljewbook.com.
H: Are you planning any followup books in the same vein?
K: I have a few things in development. Stay tuned!

Russia hints will not sell missiles to Iran

By YOSSI MELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

MOSCOW — A Russian Foreign Ministry official has suggested Moscow will not sell advanced anti-aircraft missiles to Iran.

Observers have said sophisticated S-300 missile systems could be used by Iran to defend military targets such as the Russian-built Bushehr nuclear power plant.

That would make any military strike more difficult, and Israel, the United States and other nations have pressured Russia not to sell such weapons to Iran, Syria or other nations that have threatened Israel.

Russian foreign ministry spokesperson Andrei Nesterenko was asked by reporters last Thursday whether Russia had promised Israel it would not sell weapons such as S-300s.

"We have declared more than once at the very highest political level that we do not intend to supply those types of armaments to countries located in regions that are, to put it mildly, uneasy," he said. "This is not in the interests of our country's policy or the interests of preserving stability in one region or another of the world."

He said Russia would make decisions on selling weapons systems based on both "preserving the balance of power in the given region, and taking into account the need to provide stability and security in the region."

Iran's president has said that Israel should be wiped off the map, and Israel fears that the nuclear program that Iran says is to produce power is actually meant to manufacture weapons.

Jerusalem is particularly concerned that sales of Russia's S-300 anti-aircraft missile system could threaten Israel's air superiority over both states. And if Iran received these missiles, it would be able to protect its nuclear sites more effectively, making an aerial strike on these sites more difficult.

The S-300 missile, called the SA-10 in the west, has a range of 150 kilometres and is capable of striking a plane up to 30 kilometres in the air.

Olmert, who was on a two-day visit to Moscow just before Yom Kippur, met Medvedev in the Kremlin.

During his flight to Moscow Monday, Olmert was asked whether he could influence Russia's policy on arms sales and replied, "I don't want to boast." But his chances of dissuading Medvedev from selling arms to Iran and Syria were widely considered small.

Russian sources told Ha'aretz there would be no change in Russia's position. They said Russia would not provide any Middle Eastern country with offensive weapons that could disrupt the region's stability, but would consider any request for defensive weapons.

But Israeli sources said they did not know whether Russia has already signed agreements to provide the advanced missile systems to Iran and Syria, or even whether it intends to do so, as the Russian media have reported over the past year.

Olmert landed Monday at Moscow's Domodedovo International Airport and proceeded to a meeting and dinner with Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov. Olmert told the journalists accompanying him that in addition to Russian arms sales to the Middle East, he and his hosts would discuss Iran's nuclear program and Israel's peace talks with the Palestinians and Syrians. He said the Russians "have a special interest" in the peace talks.

However, Russia was not expected to accede to Israel's request that it change its position on Iran's nuclear program. Russia objects to harsher international sanctions on Iran and has already provided low-grade enriched uranium for Iran's nuclear reactor in Bushehr, which is due to begin operating next year. Moscow is also in preliminary negotiations with Tehran to build two more reactors for electricity production in Iran.

Olmert and Medvedev also discussed the situation in Georgia following its war with Russia in August. However, Israeli sources said, Russia commended Israel for having stopped its arms sales to Georgia completely even before the war and restricted its sales to defensive systems before then, meaning the issue was no longer a strain on bilateral relations, the sources said.

Community Inclusion Awards of Excellence

CALL FOR NOMINATIONS

Does your synagogue have an outstanding individual who has made a significant impact on how the Jewish community welcomes and accepts people with special needs and/or disabilities?

Do you know of a youth group in the Toronto area which has gone out of its way to be welcoming to teens with disabilities?

Is there an organization that you're aware of that deserves to be recognized for its achievements in promoting an inclusive environment and ensuring physical accessibility for people with special needs?

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Inclusion Initiative will be hosting its second annual Community Inclusion Awards of Excellence on February 26, 2009.

Our Vision
A more inclusive Jewish community where people with special needs are able to fully participate in educational, spiritual, communal, social and recreational activities

These Awards recognize outstanding efforts by individuals, programs and organizations within the Greater Toronto Area that result in a more inclusive Jewish community.

One individual, one organization and one program will be selected to receive a Community Inclusion Award of Excellence on February 26th. Anyone in the community may complete a nomination form or individuals, organizations and programs may self-nominate.

For more information and nomination forms please email inclusionuja@mnjcc.org or leave a message 416-924-6211 ext. 255.

Neo-Nazi attack at Jewish theatre in Hungary

By ESZTER MARGIT
JTA

BUDAPEST — An acid and feces attack at the Budapest Jewish theatre just before Rosh Hashanah has revived concerns about increasing anti-Semitism in Hungary.

The attack, which occurred after the première of a provocative parody of porn, is believed to be the first open and physical attack against Jews since the country's democratic transition in 1989.

Gecy opened Sept. 27 at Siraly, this city's trendy Jewish pub-cultural centre in the area of the former ghetto. The next day, after the second performance, with the audience milling around the theatre, six or seven masked neo-Nazis appeared on the street.

In what appeared to be a choreographed attack, one shot acid from a water pistol at the director of the show, Ferenc Sebo, then spilled a bucket of pig feces over him.

People standing near Sebo were splashed and shot with acid. The attackers beat Sebo when he threw his glass at one of them, then ran into the pub to shoot acid at others. A bystander trying to help Sebo was beaten badly and remained in the hospital this week. Police arrived too late to catch the attackers.

The theatre's director, Robert Vajda, said people associated with the show had been receiving threatening messages for several weeks prior to the opening.

"Extremist websites and blogs have been agitating against us in numerous threatening writings these past three weeks," Vajda said. "Some of us got such threatening calls that the lead actor decided to withdraw from his role a week before the première."

Vajda said that neo-Nazis became furious after misinterpreting the meaning of the play, which was provocatively marketed on YouTube as a porn comedy version of The Tragedy of Men, a famous national poem by the 19th-century dramatist Imre Madach.

"These boys thought that this time they have really found something: cat-murdering Jews are turning a jewel of Hungarian cultural heritage into porn!" he said. "But when it turned out that the comedy had not much to do either with Madach or with real porn, they got even more furious."

> 'Extremist websites and blogs have been agitating against us in numerous threatening writings these past three weeks'

Adam Schoenberger, one of the founders of Siraly, said the theatre had requested police security for both nights, but only received it for the première. He said the police later told organizers that they had been wrongly informed that the Sunday performance was cancelled.

According to a police communique, Tamas Polgar Tomcat, a neo-Nazi blogger, claimed on his blog to be an animal rights activist whose primary target was Zoltan Toepler, the author of Gecy, whose award-winning documentary film recorded the killing of a kitten.

Schoenberger said that the "official" target of the attack may have been the playwright, but since they could not find him, they spilled their hate on everyone associated with Jews.

In a short movie circulated on Tomcat's blog, made during and after the attack, one of the masked attackers openly admitted he was a "racist."

The attack on the theatre is the latest – and most aggressive – in a string of incidents raising alarm bells in the Jewish community.

An incident in the spring involving a heated exchange between a customer and a store clerk at a store in a Jewish neighbourhood led to a Molotov cocktail being thrown at the store and calls for a mob action against it.

Thousands of anti-fascists blocked the street on the day of the planned action. Among those who appeared to protect the store was Hungary's prime minister, Ferenc Gyurcsany.

The attack at Siraly continues a trend of "the growing anti-Semitic, anti-Jewish, racist verbal attacks at public gatherings, media and Internet sites," Peter Feldmajer, the president of the Federation of Hungarian Jewish Communities, told JTA.

Feldmajer said that while the performance did have "questionable content," it is clear from the blogs that the perpetrators' main problem was that it was presented by the Jewish theatre.

Gyorgy Vari, a Jewish blogger and university lecturer, said that over the past few months, "there were general anti-Semitic instigations and threats on several blogs, which intensified and became more explicit before the performance of the Jewish theatre."

After the attack at the theatre, a writer for Kurucinfo, a well-read extreme right-wing blog, wrote: "There wasn't any scandal, the performance wasn't disturbed, the disgusting Hebrews were not beaten in mass. All what happened was that some members of their crime-gang received a portion of what the material manifestation of their spirit is, a bucket of feces," so that "that they can be really stinking Jews."

Vari said the Siraly attack "was the first time since the change of the regime in 1989 when an openly anti-Semitic physical insult happened."

Schoenberger added, "This was a clear first step towards the direction when anti-Semites openly beat up Jews at Jewish places."

While the Jewish federation did not publicly condemn the attack – to the dismay of the theatre organizers – Feldmajer told JTA that he blamed lax laws, indifferent courts and inadequate security.

The Jewish federation promised to take steps to introduce better legal measures and increase security, but emphasized that it is the duty of the police to provide lawful order.

Meanwhile, local authorities said they were investigating the incident. But theatre organizers have turned to a civil rights organization, Company for Freedom Rights, to pursue legal remedies to prevent such actions in the future.

The neo-Nazi reaction to the show – and the local media coverage it inspired – helped fuel its popularity, with additional performances scheduled this week. This kind of response confuses the extremists, Vajda said.

"We do stand up and show that we are not threatened. The show must and will go on."

New Zealand university removes neo-Nazi thesis

JTA

HAMILTON, N.Z. — A New Zealand university removed a student's thesis on neo-Nazism from its library.

The University of Waikato made the move following harsh criticism from the key subject of the thesis, Kerry Bolton, a former secretary of the National Front who has been involved in neo-Nazi organizations in New Zealand for more than two decades.

The thesis by Roel van Leeuwen, 39, published six months ago, earned the philosophy student first-class honours under the co-supervision of Prof. Dov Bing, an expert on Holocaust denial.

Dreamers of the Dark: Kerry Bolton and the Order of the Left Hand Path, a case-study of a Satanic/Neo-Nazi Synthesis was removed from the library and its online archive two weeks ago. Neither Van Leeuwen nor Bing were notified of its removal, according to the university's student newspaper, Nexus.

In an Aug. 25 letter to the university's vice-chancellor, Bolton wrote: "Having such a 'thesis' posted on the Internet amounts to what might be defined as criminal libel." He demanded the removal of the thesis, the revocation of van Leeuwen's masters degree and financial compensation for the "emotional and physical stress caused."

A university spokesperson told the Waikato Times last week that the thesis was removed pending an inquiry into Bolton's allegations. Van Leeuwen told Nexus he stood by his work.

Bolton said he is a radical conservative rather than a Nazi sympathizer. He told Nexus he has "an open mind" on the Holocaust and that "it was worth raising" whether the gas chambers at Auschwitz could have killed "as many Jews as claimed."

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — An Israeli Air Force airman captured in Lebanon in 1986 escaped two years later, but probably died while trying to reach Israel on foot, the Hezbollah guerrilla group said in a report published last week by Maariv, an Israeli daily newspaper.

Ron Arad

Hezbollah gave Israel the secret report on Ron Arad's fate as part of a United Nations-mediated prisoner swap in July. That deal went ahead, but Israel, which officially assumes Arad to be alive, dismissed the Hezbollah report as "absolutely unsatisfactory."

Arad was seized by Shiite militiamen after bailing out of his crippled warplane over Lebanon. Maariv quoted the Hezbollah report as saying that Arad was first held in Beirut and then moved to the eastern village of Nabi Cheit.

"The Israeli pilot escaped from his holding cell on the night between May 4 and 5, 1988, and headed south, toward what was then the occupied [Israeli] security zone" in south Lebanon, the Hezbollah report said, according to Maariv's front-page story.

"He was in a remote, mountainous and barren area where people rarely set foot. It is possible that he collapsed and, because of natural factors, could not keep going, or that he was injured, suffered fractures, hemorrhaging, fever, poisoning, thirst, a fall from a high cliff, or that he even fell victim to a predatory animal or walked into a minefield."

The report rejected Israeli allegations that Hezbollah or Iran, its main foreign patron, is holding Arad, Maariv said.

In the July swap, Israel released Samir Kuntar, a jailed Lebanese guerrilla that it had long described as a "bargaining chip" for Arad's return.

Hezbollah has refused any public comment on the Arad report.

Jews, Arabs riot in Acre

Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni paid a visit last Friday to Acre, the site of recent clashes between Jewish and Arab residents, and said she was sending the message that no one should take the law into their own hands. Riots erupted before dawn last Wednesday when an Arab resident of the mixed town drove his car into a Jewish neighbourhood during Yom Kippur, when even secular Jews refrain from driving out of respect. Jewish rioters alleged the man defiantly played loud music, and they proceeded to assault him, sparking large-scale clashes between Jews and Arabs in the area.

War documents released

Top Israeli army officials didn't know what was happening in the field during the 1973 Yom Kippur War, according to newly declassified documents. Israel's Defence Ministry declassified documents relating to the investigation of failures of the war. The deliberations of the Agranat Committee established to investigate the conduct of the military and the government during the war, including testimony of senior officers such as Ariel Sharon and Moshe Dayan, were made public nearly 35 years to the day after the outbreak of the war. Former prime minister Ariel Sharon, who commanded the 53rd Division during the war, told the committee that the higher command "had no idea of what was happening on the ground," Ha'aretz reported. Dayan's testimony was reminiscent of issues that arose after the 2006 Second Lebanon War, including not calling up reservists right away and nor anticipating a full-scale war.

Hamas and Abbas feud more

Hamas will not recognize Mahmoud Abbas as Palestinian Authority president after Jan. 8. A resolution approved by the ruling Hamas legislators in Gaza demands that Abbas call for elections to be held in three months, when Hamas says his term is over, Associated Press reported. Fatah says Abbas has one year left in his term. Abbas was elected president in January 2005 and his Fatah Party currently controls the West Bank. In 2006, the Islamic Hamas movement won parliamentary elections and in June of the following year took over Gaza. Hamas says it will install its own temporary president in January if Abbas doesn't call new elections, AP reported.

More Arabs enlist in IDF

The number of Israeli Arab recruits to the Israel Defence Forces has increased dramatically in the first nine months of 2008, official figures obtained by Ha'aretz indicate. The rise in the Bedouin recruitment rate is attributed to Bedouins' difficulty in finding well-paid jobs outside the military and problems with local authorities. The IDF has also improved its treatment of Bedouin army veterans and is helping them find employment. The army refused to provide precise figures, but the number of recruits is estimated to have increased by 50 to 100 from the beginning of the year, bringing the total number of recruits in 2008 to some 300.

"This strike has to be carried out as quickly as possible, through prioritizing strikes at its assets, rather than chasing after launch sites. Such a response is likely to be remembered by decision makers in Syria and Lebanon for many years, thus deepening deterrence," he said.

Maj-Gen. (Res.) Giora Eiland, formerly head of the National Security Council, belongs to a similar school of thought, and he even goes a step further.

He believes Israel failed in the Second Lebanon War and is liable to fail in a third such war, because it is fighting the wrong enemy: Hezbollah, instead of the state of Lebanon itself.

Writing for an INSS publication set to come out this week, Eiland states it is impossible to beat an efficient guerrilla army supported by a state immune from retribution.

The fact that Hezbollah has rebuilt its strongholds beneath the Shiite villages in southern Lebanon will make any IDF manoeuvring efforts difficult, he writes, adding that targeted strikes against rocket launch sites will not decrease the number of rockets fired at Israel.

"Hezbollah operates under optimal conditions from our perspective. A legitimate government runs Lebanon, supported by the West, but it is in fact entirely subordinate to the will of the Shiite organization," he writes.

Eiland recommends pre-emptive action: that Israel pass a clear message to the Lebanese government, as soon as possible, stating that in the next war, the Lebanese army will be destroyed, as will the civilian infrastructure.

"People won't be going to the beach in Beirut while Haifa residents are in shelters," he writes.

Meanwhile, the editor of the Lebanese newspaper Al Akhbar, Ibrahim al-Amin, wrote last week that a "big surprise" awaits Israel should it decide to engage in another conflict with Hezbollah.

Al-Amin, who usually uses reliable sources from within Hezbollah, warned that Israel needs to seriously consider the ramifications of a future attack on Lebanon in an article published under the headline "Israel is threatening to destroy Lebanon. What will happen during wartime?"

The article was a response to comments made by senior Israel Defence Forces officers who said that Israel will use "disproportionate force" in its next conflict with Hezbollah.

A history of the Hubble

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Regarded by many as one of America's greatest scientific accomplishments, the 18-year-old Hubble Space Telescope has added immensely to our cosmological knowledge and has changed our conception of the universe. The Universe in a Mirror: The Saga of the Hubble Space Telescope and the Visionaries Who Built It (Princeton University Press), a new book by American science writer Robert Zimmerman, offers a history of the epoch-making telescope, as well as fascinating descriptions of its most enthralling discoveries.

The star Eta Carinae was first observed in the 1830s by astronomer John Herschel, who noted a sudden increase in luminosity; for a brief time it became one of the brightest objects in the sky, then dimmed again. In subsequent years the star acquired a luminous and growing halo that scientists could not fathom. Herschel and the generations of earthbound astronomers who came after him could not get a clear enough image of the star – a supernova – to understand what was happening to it.

Eta Carinae was one of Hubble's earliest capture images and helped to inaugurate the new age in astronomy and cosmology that NASA's orbiting telescope represented. As seen from the Hubble, each detail of Eta Carinae's widening double lobe became visible – an aura that scientists now estimate is expanding at a rate of about 1.5 million miles per hour. "With this image, it was eminently clear that for the first time, the human race had put on a pair of good eyeglasses and could finally see the heavens as they really are," Zimmerman writes.

As humanity's first space-based telescope, the Hubble Space Telescope does not see the heavens "through a glass darkly" – that is, through the distorting filter of earth's atmosphere. From its orbit above the earth, it has gained the sharpest and most magnified views of the universe we have yet been able to achieve.

Its huge mirror was polished with such precision that a person using the telescope could theoretically distinguish the difference between a dime and a silver dollar from a distance of 40 miles. Furthermore, it is sensitive enough to pick up light of the 30th magnitude, six billion times dimmer than the human eye can perceive. "After eons of peering at the sky through foggy glasses and seeing only a blur, the human race was about to get its first unblunted view of heaven," Zimmerman explains of the mood as the Hubble was first launched.

In 1995, a scientist trained Hubble's lens on a tiny dark spot in the celestial heavens: a patch of sky smaller than one- 10th of your thumbnail when held at arm's length. This speck of the cosmos seemed not much larger in area than a grain of sand, yet scientists were amazed at what it contained. For a period of 10 days, the telescope focused on this dark spot for a series of long-exposure photographs in ultraviolet, optical and infrared light.

What it found was a dense sprinkling of more than 3,000 strangely shaped galaxies, some at the most distant reaches of the universe more than 13 billion light-years away. This first "deep field" observation from Hubble generated intense discussion among cosmologists and hundreds of scientific papers about the early evolution of galaxies and the "baby boom" of star formation that supposedly occurred in the universe's infancy.

"Before Hubble," Zimmerman explains, "this early universe had been inaccessible. Now the scientists could reach out and at least get a glimpse of these distant and faint objects and how their evolution over time produced the galaxies we see today in the local universe."

In a wonderful chapter titled New Phenomena Not Yet Imagined, Zimmerman describes these and many other very distant objects that have revolutionized our understanding of the cosmos. The Hubble has given us much better views of supernovae such as Eta Carinae, as well as quasars, cepheids, black holes, brown dwarfs and other astronomical formations. Many are reproduced in the book's colour plates.

A spectacular image of the Eagle Nebula shows towering pillars of gas being illuminated and reduced by the radiation of a nearby star. Images of the Orion Nebula show strange spherical blobs of matter called "proplyds," for proto-planetary disks. When first pinpointed, proplyds helped support the theory that planetary formation is common throughout the universe. Many extra-solar planets were subsequently discovered using other types of telescopes.

Cosmologists have determined that the universe is about 14 billion years old, that it had a moment of creation, and that it is expanding. Hubble observations indicate that the rate of expansion is accelerating. Astronomers hypothesize the existence of unknown quantities of "dark energy," repulsing the effects of gravity over large distances, to explain the acceleration.

The chapters describing Hubble's history, bureaucratic turf wars and technological troubles – such as a short-sighted lens, later corrected – are interesting but do not arouse the sort of fascination that comes with the descriptions of extra-terrestrial phenomena that we have been privileged to view.

A space shuttle mission had been scheduled to visit the Hubble this month to provide much-needed repairs that would have extended its life for another five years at least. However, the mission was postponed after the telescope suddenly went black in late September due to a computer malfunction. NASA is planning a new repair mission to give the telescope a second life before its inevitable fall from orbit and disintegration into dust.

Since the Hubble has given us an unprecedented and extraordinary view of the "heavens as they really are," some readers of this book may feel an increased sense of awe and reverence toward the "Yotzer Hame'orot" – "the One who fashions the luminaries" – that we refer to in our prayers.

Films expose the problem of impoverished Holocaust survivors in Israel

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Although hundreds of millions of dollars have been earmarked for the care and support of Holocaust survivors in Israel, tens of thousands of them live in abject poverty.

Both documentaries will be screened by the Toronto Jewish Film Festival on Sunday, Oct. 19 at 5 p.m. at the Sheppard Grande Theatres as part of its Chai Tea & A Movie series.

Vilnai-Federbush and Meroz, who will attend the screening and take questions from the audience, are outraged that so many Israeli survivors are destitute. In their estimation, one-quarter of survivors, or 80,000 individuals, are poverty-stricken.

Essentially, they lay blame for this dire situation at the door of the New York-based Claims Conference, whose mandate is to channel German reparation funds to survivors. Yet they also charge that the Israeli government has not done nearly enough to remedy their plight.

Vilnai-Federbush and Meroz are muckrakers. They do not pretend to be objective observers. Their goal is to cut through the cant and the bureaucracy so as to solve this gnawing problem.

In their quest for justice, they embark on what they describe as a "shameful journey," travelling through Israel, Germany, Holland and the United States interviewing survivors, functionaries and government ministers.

The survivors they meet seem to have fallen through the cracks.

Esther Franks, who lives alone, can hardly make ends meet and has become a shut-in, not having left her apartment in four years. "It gets worse from one day to the next," she laments.

Elizabeth Dargotski, whose only companions are her beloved cats, goes hungry quite often. As a survivor who hid in a forest and never knew when her next meal would appear, she is inured to hunger.

In Berlin, the filmmakers talk to a survivor who left Israel because benefits are far more generous in Germany. She is ashamed that Israel is not properly looking after the needs of her fellow survivors.

Vilnai-Federbush and Meroz interview the former head of the Jewish community in Berlin, Albert Mayer, and he cannot understand why survivors in Israel must endure the indignity of poverty while more than one billion dollars in restitution funds sloshes around the coffers of the Claims Conference.

Trying to find answers to their probing questions, they attempt to interview Israel's finance minister, but they are fobbed off. They corner Reuben Merhav, the Claims Conference representative in Israel, but he is also unco-operative. Eventually, he agrees to a meeting, but to their regret, he does nothing to assist the survivors.

They show up, unannounced, in Claims Conference headquarters in New York and request a meeting with its president, Gideon Taylor. He is apparently busy and his secretary suggests that they make an appointment. "I can't have you wait here," she says, a touch of impatience and exasperation in her voice.

Undaunted, they barge into a conference room in Jerusalem, finding Taylor sitting there at a table with other officials. He remains silent, but a survivor they have expressly brought in for the occasion wailingly complains that she cannot pay her utility bills.

They then address a related topic, the issue of abandoned Jewish property in Israel. Purchased by European Jews who perished during the Holocaust, this property is said to be held by the state, banks and the Jewish National Fund. In their view, the Israeli government must do more to track down the rightful heirs.

Talking to Holland's finance minister, they wonder why there are so many destitute survivors in Israel. He observes that Israel has to set priorities in its budget.

As Paying for Justice ends, they report that Israel has set aside a further 120 million shekels for survivors.

Early on in the sequel, they add that the Knesset has passed legislation to increase their benefits. Yet the overall situation is far from satisfactory.

Rafi Eitan, an Israeli cabinet minister responsible for pensioners, says that the Claims Conference is not sufficiently helping survivors. Later, he declares that survivors have no time for the wheels of bureaucracy to turn.

And in a damning comment, a former Claims Conference employee informs the filmmakers that 10,000 letters from survivors went unanswered when she worked there. They point out that almost 2,000 survivors have gone to court to claim reparations.

Vilnai-Federbush and Meroz suggest that the Claims Conference – which they call the world's richest Jewish organization – funnels funds to religious Jewish organizations and museums whose programs do not pertain to the Holocaust.

Plaintively, they ask Germany's finance minister whether he can be of help. He replies that Jewish communities and organizations should deal with such issues.

Indeed, they should, post-haste.

To their credit, Vilnai-Federbush and Meroz have exposed this open wound in the Jewish world.

KINDERTRANSPORT COMING TO AL GREEN THEATRE

The Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company opens its new season with Kindertransport, a play by Diane Samuel that focuses on Britain's prewar program to rescue Jewish children from Germany and Austria, and one girl's experience as she is separated from her family and searches years later for her identity.

In the months leading up to World War II, nearly 10,000 unaccompanied Jewish children escaped from Germany on trains headed for the freedom of Britain. Most never saw their parents again. Spared the horrors of the death camps, the Jewish kinder were separated from their families and transported to a different culture where they faced a mixture of kindness, indifference, occasional exploitation, and the selflessness of ordinary people faced with needy children.

Kindertransport previews at the Al Green Theatre, Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, from Nov. 4. It opens Nov. 6 and runs until Nov. 23. Tickets are $32 to $52. 416-366-7723, www.hgjewishtheatre.com

Toronto Centre for the Arts (Studio Theatre), 5040 Yonge St., Oct. 23 to Nov. 2. $28 to $30. 416-872-1111, www.encoreshows.com

Names in the News: Ray Jessel was lured from Toronto decades ago to co-write the Sherlock Holmes Broadway musical Baker Street and was the last lyricist to work with Richard Rodgers. In Hollywood, he was writer-producer for the Dean Martin Show, Carol Burnett Show, Head of the Class and The Love Boat. His songs have been recorded by Louis Armstrong, Jimmy Durante, Peggy Lee, Sammy Davis Jr. and Michael Feinstein.

"In the royal court of cabaret, Ray Jessel is the jester," according to Time Out magazine. "The septuagenarian Welsh-Jewish songwriter's prankishly literate ditties recall the smart novelty songs of Tom Lehrer, Allan Sherman and other masters of high silliness."

Lately a principal in New York's Don't Tell Mama, Jessel brings his irreverent "Songs from the Ridiculous to the Romantic" to Toronto this month for one performance only. Academy of Spherical Arts, 1 Snooker St. (Atlantic Ave. at King St. W.), Oct. 17, 8:30 p.m. Dinner served from 6 p.m. $15 advance, $18 at the door. Reservations 416-532-2782.

Film Talk Sunday: Join film journalist Shlomo Schwartzberg on a series exploring the international Jewish experience in film in Israel, France, South America and other places. "The French Experience" is the topic on Oct. 19, 11 a.m. to 12:30 p.m. Miles Nadal JCC. $9 includes light breakfast. 416-924-6211, ext. 0

Israeli TV Documentaries: The Toronto Jewish Film Festival opens its Chai Tea & A Movie series with the bombshell Israeli TV documentary Paying For Justice, by Israeli-born journalists and filmmakers Orly Vilnai-Federbush and Guy Meroz, both of whom are slated to be in attendance.

The 2007 film, which is 58 minutes long, was shown at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival, and is being shown with a 57-minute sequel made in 2008. The shocking premise is that Israeli bankers and bureaucrats have conspired to keep hundreds of millions of dollars of restitution money out of the hands of some 80,000 needy Israeli Holocaust survivors for whom the funds were meant.

Sheppard Grande Theatres, 4861 Yonge St., Oct. 19, tea at 4 p.m., film at 5 p.m.

Sci-fi icon stars in Stage West comedy Boeing, Boeing

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Gemini Award-nominated actress Ellen Dubin is starring as airline stewardess Gloria Hawkins in the 1960s comedy Boeing, Boeing.

At Stage West Theatre in Mississauga, Boeing, Boeing is about an architect living in Paris who juggles relationships with three airline stewardess/fiancées.

"All three of the stewardesses are archetypes," says Dubin. "Gloria Hawkins is the brassy, loud American girl who loves to have a good time. She has a huge appetite for food and life, and you see that reflected in everything she does – broad, big actions and everything is over the top. She has a lot of fun – she does whatever she feels."

Dubin, a Toronto native, says that just like Gloria, she is a take-charge woman who likes to dive into life.

However, unlike Gloria, Dubin is happily married. "That is the biggest difference between us," she says. "I am a one-man woman, and Gloria likes to juggle a bit." Dubin is married to Jay Switzer, a former president and CEO of CHUM Television.

Like Gloria, though, Dubin spends a lot of time flying, since the couple divides their time between a rental apartment in Los Angeles and a condo in Toronto, where her close family lives. However, she says she really lives out of a suitcase and travels to where the work is.

In Boeing, Boeing, Dubin gets to kiss American co-star Peter Scolari of Bosom Buddies and Newhart fame, something she says is rather pleasurable. "Peter Scolari is one of the most generous, soulful, sweet men. He's an adorable sweetie to kiss. He's a dental freak in terms of his hygiene, just like me. It's such a pleasure because I'm so meticulous with my dental hygiene and so is he, so we always smell good… he's a pleasure to kiss."

Boeing, Boeing's director Jim Warren personally tapped Dubin for the role of Gloria. "We were in a play together – A Servant of Two Masters – when he was an actor," she says. "We had a great time touring all over Canada. A couple of months ago, he phoned me out of the blue and asked if I would be willing to come back from L.A. and work on this play.

"He told me he thought that I would be fabulous. I said to him that I'm terrified to do a play again in Toronto… so let me do it. That's the way I work, if I'm afraid, that means it is time to do it."

Dubin has become a sci-fi icon for her role as Giggerota in the international hit television series Lexx. Her other movies and TV credits include The Dead Zone, A Wrinkle in Time, Highlander, and Napoleon Dynamite. Dubin plays journalist Jeri Slate in the Leo Award-winning supernatural drama series The Collector, which airs in 65 countries, including on Citytv stations across Canada.

Dubin is also doing the film festival circuit, promoting a comedy thriller called Bull and the romantic Lost and Found, a Bravo-sponsored film that she starred in and produced.

Dubin is the spokesperson for the Make A Wish Foundation in Toronto and central Ontario, a charity close to her heart.

Boeing, Boeing runs until Nov. 23. For tickets, visit www.stagewest.com or call the box office at 905-238-0042.

Ellen Dubin enjoyed performing opposite Peter Scolari.

Toronto composer gives old tale a new tune

By EZRA GLINTER
Special to The CJN

The works of Yiddish writer Isaac Bashevis Singer have been adapted for the stage and the screen for many years. Now, Toronto drummer and composer Lorie Wolf has reinterpreted one of the Nobel Prize-winning author's most famous stories through jazz.

Taibele and Her Demon tells the story of Taibele, a woman who has been abandoned by her husband and is unable to remarry because she doesn't have a proper divorce.

Alchonon, a poor teacher's assistant, falls in love with Taibele, but doesn't know how to win her affection. One day, he hears Taibele and her friends telling the story of a demon who seduces a woman.

Lorie Wolf [Jackie Shapiro photos]

Inspired by the story, Alchonon slips into Taibele's room at night and pretends to be a demon himself. Taibele is initially frightened, but she soon begins to love Alchonon, though she never discovers his true identity.

"It's one of the stories that I loved the most, that I read over and over again. I identified with her. The character resonated with me," Wolf says. "There's something so beautiful about it. He starts off trying to trick her, and maybe make a mockery of her, but they wind up loving each other."

Wolf's Taibele and her Demon is primarily a jazz album, but its influences range from klezmer to tango. The mood of the music extends from playful and devious to mournful, as the story follows its tragic arc.

Though the album stays rooted in Singer's story, Wolf says the music was also inspired by personal experience.

"My mom was in the hospital at the time, and I was experiencing a lot of sadness. The fourth track on the record is for Alchonon, but it was from the sadness I was experiencing," she says.

In addition to the music, spoken word interludes tell the story as it progresses. Wolf uses Singer's text, but recasts the narrative by putting it in the first person.

"There's not too many stories by Isaac Bashevis Singer in the first person, and in any case, he never writes from a woman's perspective. But this is a woman's story and I wanted it to resonate with women listening to it for the first time," she says.

Wolf began composing the music for the CD while studying music two years ago at Humber College. When she played the composition for her final recital, her teachers persuaded her to record it.

After winning a grant to finance the recording, Wolf headed into the studio with fellow Humber students, as well as a few of Canada's most respected jazz artists, including bassist George Koller and keyboardist Don Thompson.

Though nearly all of the music was composed and arranged by Wolf, she also gave the musicians room to improvise. On Seven Wives, Alchonon describes each of his demon lovers, and Wolf gave each of the musicians the task of expressing one of the wives through their instrument.

In addition to writing and arranging her own music, Wolf plays with groups such as the Lithuanian Empire, a klezmer-funk fusion outfit, the Sisters of Sheynville, an all-female Yiddish swing ensemble, and rock band the Dull Eyed Llamas. She also teaches music at Clinton Street Junior Public School.

Cover art for Taibele and Her Demon

Though Taibele and Her Demon has yet to be officially released, it's already available for purchase over the Internet and was recently aired in its entirety by radio host Laurie Brown on CBC Radio 2.

"I've been working on this for a long time and I'm really happy with it," she says. "I think people will take notice."

Taibele and Her Demon is available from www.cdbaby.com/cd/loriewolf or visit www.loriewolf.com for more information.

Winnipeg Jewish Theatre to perform on Shabbat

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — For the first time since it opened its doors in 1987, the Winnipeg Jewish Theatre (WJT) has decided to hold performances on Friday evenings and on Saturday afternoons.

For the last 20 years, rather than have performances scheduled on the Sabbath, the WJT performed on Wednesday evenings and on Sunday afternoons and evenings at the Berney Theatre, on the Asper Jewish Community Campus.

Michael Nathanson, artistic producer of the WJT, said tickets for shows on the Sabbath will have to be pre-purchased, as "we will definitely not be having cash exchanges" on Shabbat.

The mandate of the WJT, which up until 2006 was the only professional Jewish theatre in Canada, is to present theatre that reflects the Jewish experience of the past, present and future. The WJT also encourages the creation of new Canadian plays of Jewish interest and promotes better understanding of the Jewish community in the community at large.

Nathanson said the decision to hold performances on Shabbat "was economically driven."

He added: "It was not a decision that we reached lightly… We approached this with great trepidation… There was a lot of discussion back and forth [at the board level]. It was not a unanimous decision. But it was one that we felt was worth exploring. We have made a decision to try this for a year and see if it is something we want to continue. It is not a decision made in perpetuity."

The WJT is one of 14 members of the Association for Jewish Theatre in North America. Nathanson said that "four of the 14 members are holding performances on Shabbat. The Harold Green Jewish Theatre in Toronto [founded in 2006] holds Friday-night performances, and they are dealing with a Jewish population that is much larger than the one in Winnipeg. The Arizona Jewish Theatre and the West Coast Jewish Theatre in California also hold performances on the Sabbath."

As well, Nathanson said that "the gym at the Rady Centre at the Asper Campus, which is the building where the theatre performances take place, is open on Friday evening until 8 p.m., and also opens on Saturdays at noon. The Rady Centre is a precedent for being open on the Sabbath. The centre [and the WJT] are in similar situations, in that both Jews and non-Jews attend."

Nathanson said that the weekend performances "provide double the revenue" as weekday performances… Over the course of one season, that is thousands of dollars. We are a small theatre, and we have to be concerned with the long-term [financial health] of the theatre."

In 2006, the WJT, which was on the verge of closing for lack of finances, had a campaign to "Save the Theatre."

"We needed $50,000 to keep our doors open," Nathanson said, adding that the money was raised and "we do not want to go back to that situation."

The pamphlet that subscribers and ticket purchasers for the 2008-2009 season of receive, which is also posted on the theatre's website, explains the Shabbat decision as follows: "We recognize that there are those who feel that a Jewish theatre should not operate on a Friday night. We understand and respect that viewpoint. The reality, however, is that weekend performances are extremely popular with theatregoers. Our belief is that, in order for WJT to grow as a theatre, we need to experiment by making this option available to those who wish to partake."

Nathanson said that "the WJT relies on grants, donations, and sponsorships" and is not a beneficiary agency of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg.

The WJT Endowment Trust, which was established in 1991, is an important source of revenue and currently generates $30,150 each year toward the company's annual operating costs, he said.

"Ticket revenues make up 22 to 23 per cent of our operating revenues," Nathanson said, adding that patrons of the theatre are both Jewish and non-Jewish.

"Ultimately we are an arts organization, not a religious organization. Our goal is to present great theatre."

'Peace Team' loses games, but wins fans

By NADAV SHLEZINGER
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — They may have finished 13th out of 16 countries, but the combined Israeli-Palestinian Peace Team was the biggest winner with the fans and the media at the recently concluded Australian rules football International Cup in and around Melbourne.

The Peace Team was no match for its opponents in the group stages, losing by 127 points to Great Britain, 133 to eventual champion Papua New Guinea and 170 to the tiny south Pacific nation of Nauru – the equivalent of losing by seven to 10 goals in a game of soccer.

However, the sentimental favourite salvaged some pride in the playoffs for the lower rankings with a 75-point win over Finland and a nine-point victory over China – the latter coached by Darryl Hoffman, an Australian Jew living in Beijing.

Big contributions were made by both Israelis and Palestinians, with Asher Suissa, Fares Swaitti, Dror Haim and Moshe Lagisa the best players over the five games, and co-captain Kamal Abualthom, the team's top scorer.

The Peace Team received more publicity than any of the other competing squads, with features in major Australian newspapers and television stations nationwide. Several receptions were organized in honour of the team, including one hosted by the chancellor of Sydney University.

The Peace Team was funded by the Peres Center for Peace and the east Jerusalem-based Al-Quds Association for Democracy and Dialogue. The idea for the team first came up when James Demetriou, brother of Australian Football League (AFL) chief executive Andrew Demetriou, was introduced to the Peres Center during a trip to Israel. Soon afterward, the AFL approved the project, and Robert DiPierdomenico, a five-time premiership player in the Victorian Football League (VFL, the precursor to the AFL), was appointed head coach.

DiPierdomenico, better known in Australia by his nickname "Dipper," spent a week in Israel in July, accompanied by another Australian football legend, Ron Barassi. Barassi, who won 10 VFL premierships as a player and coach during a career spanning more than four decades, has been one of the main people behind the game's push abroad, most notably in Ireland.

Now retired from official duties, 72-year-old Barassi said he came to Israel out of love for the game and a desire to help bring peace between Israelis and Palestinians.

"The main reason why I'm here [is] to try and help in this cause," Barassi said. "Having a father who was killed in the Second World War – his body still lies in northern Africa, in Tobruk – I hate war."

The veteran player said the sport's emphasis on teamwork could help peace efforts.

"That's a very passionate objective they have, trying to use sport, in this case Australian football, to get peace down into the thinking of the community," he said. "Unless those people [in the community] agree, in the finish, you won't get peace.

Soccer player in tzitzit keeps the faith

By MOSHE BOKER
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — He convinced his teammates to observe kashrut, led prayers for the entire squad and at one point even left the sport for religious reasons, only to return on the advice of his rabbi. He also happens to be the unchallenged leader of Israel's under-21 national soccer team, which met Italy on Monday (after The CJN went to press) in its campaign to break into next year's European Championship.

Meet Oshri Roash, 20, defender in tzitzit.

Four years ago, the national under-16 team was competing in Hungary when its tour bus stopped in front of a hotel.

"Guys, this is our hotel," then-manager Moshe Agayev told his players.

"This isn't a hotel," coach Avraham Bachar said. "It's a palace. This is where the king used to live."

All the players rushed into the hotel except one – Roash, wearing a kippah and tzitzit, who lingered at the entrance to the opulent edifice. Roash had just begun the process of becoming more observant.

After a pep talk from Bachar, Roash reluctantly agreed to go inside. Several minutes later, the coach discovered that all of his players had disappeared.

"I went into the lecture hall and was shocked to see Roash leading the team in prayer. I was really astonished to see Bibris Natko and Dela Yampulski [Roash's Circassian and Christian teammates, respectively] participating, each wearing a kippah and tallit," Bachar said.

Roash told the coach he felt the need to convene the players and ask God to pardon them for lodging in the cross-emblazoned building.

"Young players don't always know what they want," Roash recalled. "I tried to instil some faith in them, not through pressure or force, and that helped us win. Seeing Jews in a kippah and tzitzit is a great pleasure, and it was a lot of fun to have Natko and Yampulski with us, too."

"It really united us and proved that the religious path can only lead to good things, no matter which country you're from," he said.

That prayer session may not have been the only factor contributing to the team's entry into the European Championship four years ago, but it certainly didn't hurt. Teammates say they hope that this year, Roash's unswerving faith will again inspire them in their campaign to enter next year's European Championship.

"I won't forget him. He was an exceptional player," Bachar said. "I'm not a religious person, but Oshri infected all of us with his faith. I have no doubt that that faith, not only religious but also professional, helped us unite and to make it to the European Championship."

Ahead of last month's match with European giant Germany, coach Motti Ivanir calculated that if Roash could thwart the scoring efforts of Bayern Munich star Toni Kroos, the German offensive machine would be significantly weakened.

"I knew he was the man who could contain Kroos, and I wasn't mistaken," Ivanir said after the match.

Making personal connections in medical care

By MICHAEL GORDON

The Senior Side of Life

One Monday afternoon, at the geriatric clinic where I teach, the family-medicine resident came into my office to present the patient she had just evaluated. The patient had, as is usually the case, multiple medical problems and had seen many medical specialists.

She had undergone extensive testing, with several trials of medications to elucidate her problem, but with no real resolution. As we reviewed the patient's symptoms and the investigations, it seemed that the options for further exploration were becoming fewer and fewer.

With an open mind, I went in to see the patient and prepared myself to hear her story from her own lips, to make sure that what the medical resident told me was an accurate reflection of the patient's history. I always try to establish a personal connection with the patient, as at the next visit, I will likely have a different medical resident working with me.

When I begin my interviews with patients, I find that some of them are quite distant and others more forthcoming or personal. As we did our initial explorations, of who this woman was and her background, I knew from the medical resident's history and from the patient's accent that she was eastern European and Jewish. The resident was of eastern European, non-Jewish background and seemed to have a reasonable understanding of Holocaust history.

I used the word "tzimmes" in my conversation with the patient, while I was trying to explain, simply, the treatment we were planning. I turned to the resident and started to explain what "tzimmes" is when the patient piped in, saying, "A carrot tzimmes. I am a Litvak." After I explained to the resident what that was all about, I turned to the patient and said, "I, too, am a Litvak, and my grandparents were from Eishyshok."

The patient bolted from her chair and with great excitement said, "I am from Eishyshok and became a partisan before the Nazis came."

I knew from my own research that 3,446 Jews from the village were rounded up and shot by the Nazis and buried in mass graves on Sept. 25 and 26, 1941.

She asked what my grandparents' names were, and I explained that they had left during the pogrom period at the turn of the 20th century, and therefore it was unlikely that she or her family would have known them.

Our conversation ranged from the 900-year history of the village – as captured in the wonderfully documented book There Once Was a World, by Brooklyn College professor Yaffa Eliach, whose lectures my parents used to attend – to the photographic exhibition of Eishyshok, organized by Eliach. The exhibit, now a centrepiece of the Washington Holocaust Museum, is a memorial not just to the village but also to the destroyed eastern European Jewry.

The medical resident seemed mesmerized by the conversation, and every few moments the patient or I turned to her to explain part of the story, such as how Eliach, then a child, was saved from being shot by a non-Jewish neighbour who grabbed her from the line of Jews marching to the killing pit and protected her in her home.

The interview with the patient ended with some discussion of plans for medical exploration of her symptoms and final farewells in Hebrew, when the patient revealed that she went to Israel before coming to Canada and discovered that I, too, had lived in Israel. Ending the interview in Hebrew was a final testimony to her survival and that of the Jewish people.

Apple and Parsnip Soup with Coriander

3 tblsp unsalted butter
1 1/2 lbs. Granny Smith apples, peeled, cored, sliced
1 1/2 lbs. parsnips, peeled, sliced
1 lg onion, chopped
1 1/2 tsp ground coriander
4 c pareve chicken broth or vegetable broth

chopped fresh parsley — apple slices (optional)

Melt butter in heavy large pot over med.-high heat. Add apples, parsnips, onion & coriander and sauté until slightly softened, about 12 min. Add 4 c broth; bring to boil. Reduce heat to med.-low, cover, simmer until apples & parsnips are tender, about 40 min. Puree soup in blender in batches. Return puree to saucepan. Or use immersible blender right in pot. Thin with more broth if desired. Season with salt and pepper to taste. Ladle into bowls. Sprinkle with parsley; garnish with apple slices if desired and serve.

Epi on Education

Seymour Epstein

The Talmud in tractate Sanhedrin (4:5) states that "humans were created singly… to declare the greatness of the Holy One, blessed be He, for man stamps many coins with one die, and they are all alike, but the King, the King of kings, the Holy One, blessed be He, stamped each person with the seal of Adam, and not one of them is like the other."

It's possible to see this latter quote from Proverbs as a commentary on the teaching from tractate Sanhedrin, even though the biblical verse predates the talmudic one. It's as if we know in our genes that each of us is unique and that when we come to teach and to learn, our differences must be taken into account. As old as that lesson is, we have had to remind ourselves from time to time that all real learning is individual and that good teaching must be, accordingly, individualized.

In the last few years, Howard Gardner's theories of "multiple intelligences" have inspired and guided educators toward a system of differentiated learning, whereby curricular objectives have been transformed to suit the different needs of vastly different children. Obviously, certain basics are taught to every child who can master them, but differentiated learning recognizes that even in the basic subject areas of math, Hebrew, reading and Torah, different humans learn in different ways.

More importantly, perhaps, is the notion that some children excel in certain domains of intelligence (e. g. musical, linguistic or interpersonal) and should be encouraged to develop themselves in those areas to the maximum of their abilities.

It's for this reason that a major program has been launched in the Jewish schools of Toronto by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education (the Mercaz). Quality review and enhancement (QRE) is the new interface between the Mercaz and all of its affiliated educational institutions, and the theme for the next few years of collaborative introspection, evaluation, benchmarking and enhancement is differentiated learning – inspired as we were by Proverbs, Sanhedrin and Harvard University's Howard Gardner.

Use honey to sweeten the holidays

Inspired by an exhibition titled Sweet as Honey, the Bible Lands Museum Jerusalem published a collection of recipes with the same title, in celebration of the High Holidays.

A centre for cultural and educational programming, it is the only museum in the world displaying the history of the biblical period in the various lands of the Bible.

The holiday cookbook is illustrated with photographs of selected artifacts, objects from the biblical period, along with traditional and innovative recipes to make with honey.

The introduction notes that in ancient times, honey was made mainly from fruit. The first evidence of the collection of bee honey appeared in cave paintings from northern Spain, dating back to approximately 7000 BCE.

Along with the recipes, which include salads, chicken, meat, fish and challah, there is a section on how to make fig, date and grape honey. Most recipes in the cookbook, however, use bee honey.

Here are samples from the dessert section of the cookbook.

HONEY COOKIES

Prepare one day in advance.

Sift together:
4 cups cake flour
1/4 tsp. baking soda
1 tsp. cinnamon
1/4 tsp. nutmeg
1/3 tsp. ginger

Combine:
2/3 cup honey
1/2 cup brown sugar
1 tbsp. water

Boil the honey, sugar and water for five minutes, then add dry ingredients to the boiled mixture.

Mix in:
1 egg (lightly beaten)
1 1/2 cups candied fruits
1 cup chopped almonds

Press dough into a ball, wrap in waxed paper and refrigerate for one or two days.

Roll out dough on lightly floured board and cut into small strips. Bake on greased baking sheet in moderate oven for 15 minutes.

When cool, glaze with:
2 cups icing sugar
3 tbsp. boiling water
1 tsp. vanilla

Beat well. Spread on cookies while glaze is warm.

DATE HONEY FINGERS

3/4 cup flour
1/2 tsp. baking powder
pinch salt
2/3 cup chopped dates
1/2 cup chopped walnuts
1/4 cup butter
2 eggs
5 tbsp. honey
powdered sugar

Preheat oven to 375. Grease and flour an 8-in.-sq. baking pan. Sift together flour, baking powder and salt. Mix in dates and nuts.

Cream butter, stir in eggs and honey. Add to dry ingredients and mix well. Pour into prepared pan. Bake 30 minutes. When cool, cut into fingers and sprinkle with powdered sugar.

Mediterranean cruise a dream come true

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Many of my friends who have gotten married over the past couple years warned me that as much as I was impatiently waiting for my wedding day to arrive, I might be depressed once it was all over.

But who had time to be depressed when I had my 10-day European honeymoon to look forward to?

My husband, Isaac, and I decided that we would go on our honeymoon about a month after the wedding, giving us plenty of time to tie up loose ends at home, leaving us with nothing to worry about while we were away.

We counted down the days until we'd be on our way to Rome to start our Mediterranean cruise that stopped in several cities in Italy, Greece and Turkey.

Both of us had travelled separately to Italy in the past, but neither of us had been to Greece or Turkey.

We had heard such amazing things about Greece, how beautiful it was, that we'd feel as if we were in paradise.

Zuchter Berk Creative Caterers at Le Parc redefines Kosher Simcha value

Spurred by the success of their introductory offer of $85 a plate (plus taxes & gratuity), Zuchter Berk Creative Caterers and Le Parc have decided not only to extend the offer, but to lower it to $77 on weekdays, when their banquet halls are more readily available.

Only when you actually see the premises and taste the food do you fully realize just how incredible this offer really is. Each of Le Parc's five splendid banquet halls is equipped with its own private bar, piano, and foyer. There you'll enjoy a full five-course meal (including open bar and sweet table) that will have you pinching yourself. Are you really getting this kind of quality at this price?

Make no mistake. Zuchter Berk and Le Parc have never compromised on quality and they never will. What you see is what you get. $77* per person weekdays, $85* per person weekends. Period.

Of course, you are by no means restricted to the promotion; Zuchter Berk will be happy to design your own menu for you and will offer you an incredible selection of traditional, Italian, Chinese, Mediterranean, Middle Eastern and West Coast specialties.

While serving as Kosher caterer to many of Toronto's largest synagogues for the past 78 years, Zuchter Berk has forged an unparalleled reputation for culinary excellence. It has also acquired unrivalled expertise in event planning through hosting gala affairs for Toronto's social and cultural elite. Its service and pricing, however, are anything but elitist.

Under the supervision of the Kashruth Council (COR), Le Parc's Kosher kitchen not only conforms to the highest standards of Kashruth but also boasts state-of-the art food preparation facilities and equipment that allow it to serve from 200 to 2,000 guests with equal ease. While the number of banquet halls in the GTA continues to grow, Le Parc has maintained its status as Toronto's favorite spot for large corporate and organizational Kosher functions.

Still the standard against which others are measured weekends) is the best reason ever to have your simcha at Toronto's premier banquet and catering facility. To dispell the notion that a Kosher event couldn't be held at Le Parc for less than $100* a plate, Zuchter Berk and Le Parc decided not to just lower that figure but to obliterate it.

From a Kosher simcha standpoint, Zuchter Berk and Le Parc is a marriage made in heaven. If you want a blissful wedding or rapturous Bar/Bat Mitzvah, call on Zuchter Berk and Le Parc to create an event that your guests will be taking about for years to come.

Cruise offers lots with minimal planning

We weighed the pros and cons of taking a European cruise – that we would only have half a day to explore each city and that we might get tired of our surroundings on the ship.

But we decided that a cruise offered us an opportunity to visit and tour eight beautiful seaside cities in just a week and a half, it required minimal planning because we would eat and sleep in the same place each night, and we'd be treated to incredible, romantic sunsets over the Mediterranean Sea every night.

As excited as I was, I couldn't help but wonder if the Greek destinations would be able to live up to the exceedingly enthusiastic hype.

To our pleasant surprise, despite the claims by everyone who had been to Greece that it had some of the most achingly beautiful islands in the world we were still awed by what we saw.

But it wasn't just Greece that impressed us. Every stop we made offered something for everyone – history, culture, and beautiful vistas.

After spending a night in a hotel suite that overlooked the Mediterranean Sea in Civitavecchia, an Italian seaport that means "ancient town," we were off to our first destination, Sicily.

When we arrived, we joined a tour that introduced us to Sicily's history and charming beauty. We travelled to Taormina, a resort town, where our guide took us on a walking tour to experience the contrast of ancient ruins and cobblestone streets, and modern boutiques and cafés.

Our next stop was in Athens, where we toured the Panathinion Stadium, the site of the first modern Olympics held in 1896, and visited the Acropolis where the Porpylea Entrance, the Erectheum, the Temple of Wingless Victory and the Parthenon have been standing since the fifth century BCE.

Mykonos, the next port of call, combined historical, legendary and cultural aspects of the Mediterranean country.

First, we took a 30-minute boat ride to the island of Delos, which was once the religious centre of the entire Aegean area. Against the backdrop of ancient ruins of shops, a theatre, mansions and monuments, our guide explained that according to Greek mythology, Delos was the birthplace of Apollo, the god of sun, music, harmony and beauty.

We then took the boat from Delos to Mykonos, a picturesque resort town where we shopped and sat to eat authentic Greek cuisine at a restaurant overlooking the sparkling sky blue water.

The following day, we were off to Turkey – a beautiful country that surprised us the most.

On our tour in Ephesus, we were taken to the "House of the Virgin Mary," where she is said to have spent the last six years of her life. We also took a tour of the ancient city of Ephesus where we saw magnificent ruins, including the Fountain of Trajan, the steam baths of Scholastika and the temple of Hadrian.

Following that, we took the time to enjoy Kusadasi, a beautiful resort area full of shops and restaurants.

By the time we got to Rhodes, Greece the next morning, we were in the mood to relax and get some sun at the beach at the Faliraki Beach Hotel complex.

And then there was Santorini, or as I like to call it, heaven on earth. We climbed 800 feet by bus on narrow, winding roads to the top of the islet, on the cliffside of a dormant volcano. We reached the village of Oia (pronounced Ee-a) where we were taken aback by the stunning vistas of blue skies, bluer water, colourful flowers and stark white buildings that clung onto the blackened cliffsides of the volcano.

Turkey surprised us the most

Our last stop before returning to Rome was at Naples and Capri. We arrived at the Marina Grand at the island of Capri after taking a 50-minute cruise through the Bay of Naples. Capri, which also offers beautiful panoramic views from the central piazzetta, has narrow cobblestone streets lined with luxury boutiques, expensive restaurants and hotels.

Once the cruise was over, we decided to spend one more day in Rome. We hopped on a shuttle bus to the city and walked to the Colosseum, the Trevi Fountain and the Vittorio Emanuele Monument, had lunch on an outdoor patio and enjoyed some gelato.

While some newlyweds may choose to spend their honeymoons relaxing on a beach at a romantic resort, Isaac and I, who love to travel, felt that we'd get more out of seeing the sights in Europe.

They say hindsight is 20/20, and looking back, Isaac and I wouldn't change a thing about our dream honeymoon.

Sometimes dreams really do come true

By ELAINE LAKE
Special to The CJN

I recently attended a friend's wedding at a temple in Las Vegas with my significant other of the last seven years. Allan and I had spoken in the months before the trip to Las Vegas about getting married while we were in Las Vegas. You see, at 54 years of age, I had never been married and although we wanted to get married, we weren't sure at this stage of our lives exactly how we would do it – this seemed the perfect answer.

So, as soon as the plane landed and we checked in at the hotel, our friend's fiance took us to get our marriage licence and we were married in front of a commissioner in beautiful downtown Las Vegas.

Now, to regress about 22 years.

In 1986, my parents were having their house redecorated using a professional interior designer. I was living away from home in my own apartment in midtown Toronto. My mother called one day and said that the designer had a brother who was painting my parents' home and he seemed like a nice guy. My mother wanted to know if she could give him my number. I trusted my mother's judgment and said 'yes.'

Elaine and Allan Lake

So, 22 years ago Allan and I dated three times. For whatever reason, neither of us was very much impressed at that time with the other and pretty much, that was the end of that and life went on for each of us. Allan met and married another woman and they had a daughter together. At some point the marriage ended and Allan was living on his own. In the meantime, I had dated off and on and had never gotten married.

My mother and I had an extremely close relationship. We would speak to each other numerous times each and every day. My friends were her friends, and vice versa. Unfortunately, 12 years ago, my mother passed away quite suddenly.

Seven years ago, I received a voice mail message from Allan reminding me of who he was and asking that I give him a call. When I received the message, it occurred to me that possibly while he was painting my parents' house he had seen an antique that he particularly liked and had heard that my mother had died and that my father had sold the house and that he was possibly interested in purchasing it.

I found out that was not at all the purpose of the call. During our conversation, he told me that he had been married and was now separated and asked if I was seriously seeing anyone. I wasn't. So, we made a date to get together for dinner. Allan's truck actually broke down the day we were supposed to have dinner, and so our dinner date was put off for a week.

Allan and I went out on our first date (15 years after our initial first date) on June 24, 2001. We went to Astoria for dinner and then we took a walk on Danforth and went for coffee to a Starbucks. I would definitely say that by the time I got back to my apartment that night, I knew 100 per cent that I wanted to spend the rest of my life with Allan! And, while I was on the phone with my friend telling her about how wonderful I thought Allan was, he called to ask me out for a second date. A second date led to a third, and so on, and so on.

Allan's extended family welcomed me from the moment we met at a Shabbat dinner at his other sister's house. Allan's mother actually calls me her third daughter.

It's comforting to me to know that Allan knew my mother. He spent three weeks painting the house and spent time with my mother, father and brother. He knew my mother to be not only kind and loving, but also as the wonderful cook that she was (apparently she fed him while he was on the job). Shortly after reconnecting with Allan, I went to the cemetery to thank my mother. My mother had an expression: "A mother always knows." I guess although my mother knew back in 1986, it took Allan and me quite a few more years.

In January of 2002, Allan and I moved into our house in Thornhill. Allan's daughter is the love of our lives and she spends a significant amount of time with us.

Allan and I appreciate each other so very much, possibly because we found each other later in our lives. Now, our dreams will continue to come true together.

Make your next event more eventful.

Staying 2 Steps Ahead of Event Perfection

When planning an event, staying on top of day-to-day occurrences can seem impossible – let alone staying two steps ahead. But have no fear; Vivian Ringwald-Levine is here to help you do just that! Whether planning a wedding, bar/bat mitzvah or special event - 2 Steps Ahead Events will ensure that all the little details are completely taken care of, leaving you free to enjoy the once-in-a-lifetime event. With experience in planning everything from grand soirees to intimate affairs, Ringwald-Levine will transform your every wish into reality, regardless of budget.

2 Steps Ahead gives the client the ability to choose from different levels of event coordination from 'Day Of' to 'Full Coordination'. And what's more, clients can specify even further by choosing from the 'A La Carte' list of services, which include...designing ceremony programs and invitations, arranging out-of-town accommodations with welcome baskets, engagement parties, post-wedding brunch, etc. While remaining amenable to her clients' every wish, Ringwald-Levine fuses every event with a bit of the au-currant. Most recently, Ringwald-Levine has delved into the world of Green by offering clients the option of using organic products and even the ability to offset wedding emissions by planting trees in guests' names!

As the name so aptly suggests, let Vivian Ringwald-Levine be 2 Steps Ahead of all the details of your event. For more information please visit www.2stepsahead.ca today!

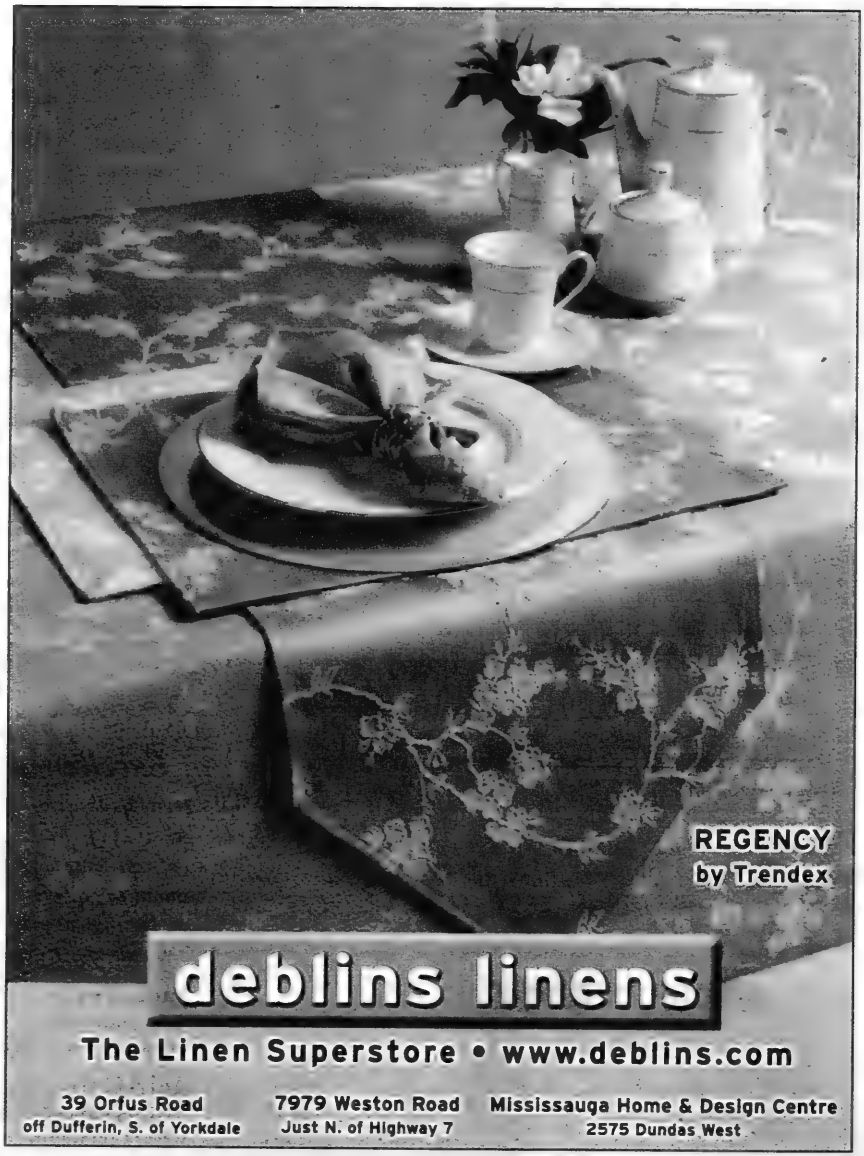
Bridal luncheon menu

By DAPHNA RABINOVITCH
Special to The CJN

The prenuptial celebrations, leading up to the big day, have their own glamour and their own pressures. If you're hosting an engagement shower or luncheon for your friend, sister or daughter, you want it to be as perfect as can be, second only to the main event. And, of course, the food, although perhaps not the highlight,(we'll leave star billing to the bride and to the gathering itself) ranks up there as at least the second most important feature. When planning a menu for any festivity, of course, you should take your culinary inspiration from the local produce of the season, enjoying its fresh flavours and textures. The following menu reflects the best and most luxurious of the season, from fresh, sultry figs to a light and sophisticated main course of delicately flavoured fish, to a garden-inspired side dish of couscous and grilled zucchini.



FIGS WITH GOAT CHEESE AND PEPPERED HONEY DRIZZLE

This exceptional appetizer can be served as an hors d'oeuvre or plated as a sit-down first course.

1/3 cup honey
3/4 tsp. freshly ground black pepper
12 fresh figs
12 pecan halves
1/3 cup soft fresh goat cheese

Stir together honey and pepper until well blended; set aside.

Starting at stem end but without cutting all the way through, cut each fig into quarters. Gently press figs open, as if for a flower with 4 petals. Spoon goat cheese evenly into centre of each fig, top with pecan. Arrange on platter. Drizzle honey mixture over. Makes 8 servings.

PISTACHIO CRUSTED BASS WITH MANGO COULIS

For the coulis, buy as ripe a mango as you can, without it being mushy. Do not coat the fish before frying as the nuts will not remain crisp.

Mango Coulis:
1 large ripe mango
1/4 cup tropical juice or water
1 tsp. light brown sugar pinch each salt and pepper

Fish:
1 1/4 cups peeled natural unsalted pistachios, finely chopped
1/3 cup dry bread crumbs
1/4 tsp. each salt and pepper
8 bass or tilapia fillets (each about 6 oz)
1/2 cup mango chutney
2 tbsp. vegetable oil

Mango Coulis: Peel mango; cut away flesh. Place flesh, juice and brown sugar in bowl of food processor. Puree until smooth. Transfer to small bowl; stir in salt and pepper. (Coulis can be covered with plastic wrap and refrigerated for up to 2 days. Bring to room temperature).

Fish: Mix together pistachios, bread crumbs and half of salt and pepper. Sprinkle fish with remaining salt and pepper. Brush chutney evenly over one side of fish. Press pistachio mixture evenly onto same side of fish. Heat oil in 2 large ovenproof skillets over medium-high heat. Place fish, non-coated side down, in pan; cook for 2 minutes. Transfer skillets to centre of preheated 425F oven and bake until fish is opaque in centre, about 8 minutes. Serve fish drizzled with room temperature mango coulis. Makes 8 servings.

WARM COUSCOUS AND GRILLED ZUCCHINI SALAD

A combination of green and yellow zucchini makes for a beautiful salad. Toasting the couscous first in a dry skillet lends a toasted nuttiness it would not otherwise have.

3 zucchini
3/4 cup freshly squeezed orange juice
3 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
1 tbsp. light brown sugar
1 tsp. ground coriander
1/2 tsp. ground cumin pinch each cinnamon, salt and pepper
2 cups couscous
1 cup chopped sweet red pepper or tomato
1/2 cup chopped fresh coriander

Cut off both stem ends from each zucchini. Cut into quarters lengthwise. In large shallow bowl, whisk together olive oil, 2 tbsp. of orange juice, sugar, coriander, cumin, cinnamon, salt and pepper. Place zucchini in bowl, tossing gently until well coated. Let stand at room temperature for 10 minutes.

Place zucchini on lightly greased grill over medium-high heat and cook, turning once or twice, for about 8 to 12 minutes or until cooked through but not mushy, brushing occasionally with any leftover mixture. Let cool on baking sheet. (Zucchini can be covered and refrigerated for up to 24 hours. Bring to room temperature).

In pot, bring 2-1/2 cups of water to a boil. Stir in couscous. Cover, remove from heat and let stand for 5 minutes. Uncover, fluff with fork. Chop zucchini into cubes. Toss together zucchini, red pepper, coriander and remaining orange juice until well combined. Season to taste with salt and pepper. Serve warm. Makes 8 servings.

Looking for the elusive "Wow" factor? It lives at K. Barketti.

Let's face it. When you spend hundreds or thousands on a dress, hearing a perfunctory "That's nice," is a bit of a letdown. What you really want to hear is "Wow!"

But where to find the elusive "Wow" factor, and how to identify it? When you've been painting the same canvas (yourself) your entire life, objectivity can be difficult. You need help in translating your design vision into reality.

Enter K. Barketti. If a designer dress shop can be said to be equal parts glamour and substance, K. Barketti is that store. Since opening in 2000, it has made its mark on the Toronto fashion scene one satisfied customer and one stunning outfit at a time.

What differentiates K. Barketti from other fine dress shops is its ability to customize any garment to your size and shape. The retail stores in Bayview Village and Square One are essentially showrooms for K. Barketti's studio on Wingold, where the garments are manufactured and customized by in-house designer Velika K.

What K. Barketti lacks in snob appeal it makes up for in exquisite fabrics, elegant styling and impeccable finishes. Buying here isn't about flaunting hoity-toity labels. It's about saving literally hundreds of dollars on a dress or outfit that screams "Designer Label" but makes much less noise at the cash register.

If you've made the rounds of Toronto's better dress shops and designers in search of a special event outfit, landing at K. Barketti feels like winning the lottery. Getting the "Wow" factor you've been seeking while actually saving money is almost too good to be true.

For proprietor Terrie Walia, the greatest satisfaction comes from seeing his customers in a garment that hits the right note. "The "Wow" factor is a bit of an oxymoron," he smiles. "It suggests a kind of immediacy, but achieving that impact is usually a time-consuming process. You have to find the right fabric in the right colour in the right construction, and ensure a perfect fit."

or a construction that just doesn't work for you. Anyone with an eye for beauty will see through it. When you're shopping for a special event outfit, treat yourself like a work of art that you're preparing for an important exhibit."

Any chance you'll encounter "art critics" at your next wedding or Bar Mitzvah? If so, devotees of the K. Barketti school offer rave reviews as evidence that the Wow factor lives at K. Barketti.

First find Mr. Right, then call the florist

By MARNI BRINDER-BYK
Special to The CJN

As a wise married woman, I feel the need, nay duty, to guide those on their way to the chupah and provide them with the wisdom of my vast experience. Sept. 2 marks my wedding anniversary, and on that wonderful date, I will have been married for one entire year – and honestly, who better to guide the soon-to-be wedded and the brides-in-training than one so experienced as myself? It is my responsibility, or perhaps my calling.

This is not a how-to for wedding planning – you hopefully have a wedding planner for that (but if you are looking for a florist I can recommend one who does wonders with a centrepiece, and a makeup artist who is like a magician). What this is, is a synopsis of life post-honeymoon – a prep course for the day after the wedding when you stop being a bride and you begin your hopefully long and distinguished career as a wife. For the record, sometimes the pay isn't great but there are some other benefits and rewards that come with the job.

Marni Brinder-Byk and Russ Byk

First, you can stop dieting. Not altogether, and I am not advocating poor health, but the end to your wedding diet goes hand-in-hand with never having to wear white again… ever. Also, you get to use new titles when talking about your spouse – I now use the word husband so much that sometimes I forget my husband Russ' name: "My husband is picking me up from work. My husband also hates sun-dried tomatoes. My husband, my husband, my husband." I also still get a kick out of him introducing me as his wife, which is way better than fiancée and infinitely better than girlfriend. A fiancée plans a wedding, a wife plans for life – and, often, dinner.

Post-wedding, you also get to do… well, everything else. You get your nights and weekends back for other activities, like gardening, decorating and yoga class. Of course, I don't do any of these things, but if I wanted to, I now have time for them. My reward was catching up on my TV shows – I really felt lost without my Grey's Anatomy and Desperate Housewives. I also have time to do nothing, which is another favourite pastime of mine, and is what my husband and I truly enjoy doing together. We like being together, doing nothing. And having that time back post-wedding is golden.

After the flowers, the cake, the gifts and the glory, all you are left is with a flurry of memories and the man you married. I love my husband more today than I did one year ago, and married life gets a little bit better every day. Being married is far easier than getting married – and I have incentive: 222 people saw us get married and I hate to disappoint an audience. So, ladies and gentlemen, future brides and grooms, take a moment from your wedding planning and think about the day after. Make sure you have found someone you can do everything and nothing with. Then make sure to call my florist.

Marilyn and David celebrate 50 years together

By BEV BERGMAN
CJN Staff

Before there was J-Date, there was Blind-Date!

Marilyn Matlow was 18 years old when she moved to Toronto from Kitchener to embark on her career as a secretary at a large insurance firm. So soon to be out of the nest, Marilyn rented a room in the home of a Jewish family to please her nervous parents.

Taking an instant liking to her, Marilyn's new landlady, Sally, made it her mission to find a "wonderful Jewish boy" for her new adopted daughter. And as it just so happened, Sally belonged to a benevolent society that also included Mickey, mother of 19-year-old David Bisgould.

One evening at a lodge meeting, Sally scribbled her phone number on a scrap of paper. Thrusting it into Mickey's hand, Sally gushed about the wonderful girl living in her house. Knowing full well that her son was picky, Mickey decided to take a chance.

David took the scrap of paper and buried it deep in his pocket, figuring his mother wouldn't ask him about it again or so he hoped. Weeks passed, and finally after being nagged enough, David reluctantly called Marilyn and asked her out.

The rest, as they say, is history. It was love at first sight, and it became clear to all that they were each other's bashert. They shared the same core values and zest for life (even though Marilyn was an avid tennis player and David was an avid tennis watcher). Their two families quickly became one, and Marilyn and David's wedding took place in Toronto at the Murray House. All of Jewish Kitchener shut down to be there.

Settling in Kitchener, the couple built a business together, raised two children, Howard and Ilena, and have enjoyed a rich life with good friends and good times.

Marilyn and David Bisgould

Nowadays, Marilyn and David spend a great deal of time on Hwy. 401, driving to Toronto to visit their five grandchildren, Rebecca, Alex, Sierra, Simone and Cailey. Their lives are occupied with dance recitals, soccer games, school plays and all that goes with enjoying the blessings of family.

More than 50 years have passed since that first blind date. As in all marriages, Marilyn and David have faced a series of challenges and experienced happy times and sad times.

In June, almost 100 of the couple's friends and family gathered to celebrate this amazing milestone. Marilyn and David were grateful for their lives together and to Mickey and Sally!

What you should do is get a consultant

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Looking back at the article I wrote in the last bridal supplement in The CJN ("What to do before you say 'I do,'" March 6), I can't help but laugh.

Oh, how naive I was.

"Relax," I said. "What's the big deal?" I arrogantly asked.

To be fair, the first 11 months of my 14-month engagement weren't a big deal. I had more than enough time to pace myself when it came to booking professionals and looking after whatever other errands had to be taken care of.

In fact, my girlfriends and family would make fun of me for being so organized and rushing to get everything done so quickly.

I didn't want to be a stressed-out bride. Why leave everything to the last minute and suffer a mental breakdown?

But nothing could have prepared me for the last three months of the planning process.

I didn't realize that there are just certain things that can't be done too far in advance and much of it has to be done at the last minute – all at once.

Just five weeks before my June wedding, I got so sick I was bedridden (and twice hospital-bound) for two full weeks. Although the doctors aren't completely sure, they suspect I caught a vicious stomach virus (which kept me from eating for nine full days and caused me, a 105-pound girl, to lose 10 pounds). I also caught pneumonia.

I'm sure that the stress of perpetually working to cross things off my never-ending to-do list caused my immune system to break down and made me susceptible to an illness that I normally would have been able to fight off without batting an eyelash.

I had been warned by many not to take on too much and not to hesitate to ask for help.

Normally, that isn't my style. Being a proud, independent woman, I'm not used to having to ask people for help.

But after having lost two weeks to an illness, I knew I needed all the help I could get.

My parents, in-laws and fiancé, Isaac, were right there when I needed them, but when it came right down to it, if it wasn't for my wedding consultant, I would have lost my mind. I don't even want to think about how much more stressful the week before the wedding would have been without my consultant, Risa Gold.

Risa has been in the business of making brides happy for 18 years, and as of seven years ago, she expanded her company, Risa Gold and Associates, to include three senior consultants and four assistants.

Risa has planned hundreds of weddings, for some as high-profile as former professional wrestler Trish Stratus.

> 'Brides should realize that planning a wedding is a major undertaking'

"Brides should realize that planning a wedding is a major undertaking – one that requires the use of professionals in many different fields and the organization of schedules to ensure that all the hard work and money that has been put into this event gets carried through just as planned," she said.

"A consultant's job is to listen to your wishes and then facilitate them."

And she did. She made suggestions about what would work best at our big, fat, Israeli-Moroccan wedding, co-ordinated schedules for all the professionals to make sure everything would run on time, and tended to whatever issues came up on the day so that I didn't have to.

But most importantly, she understood that, although she's been a part of countless weddings, most brides only get one wedding, and she worked to make it as perfect as she would want it to be for her own daughter.

The best part about having Risa at my wedding was that I was able to confidently put all my trust in her and not have to stress about anything.

Apparently, there were a couple of issues that arose that night, but my guests and I had no idea because she was always on top of the professionals to keep the night running smoothly.

For instance, just as the main course was supposed to be served, two of the four ovens in the kitchen broke down and dinner was running late.

"I had to work with your bandleader to cover the time lapse of serving your dinner so that your guests were too busy dancing and having a wonderful time to realize the delay. In respect to that, I still managed to open the sweet table on time by moving up your speeches and benching," Risa said.

She added that at another wedding she worked this summer, "the wedding cake looked like it was dropped and put back together by a five-year-old. It was a mess. Her florist was totally useless and the caterer didn't have a clue what to do. I covered it with flowers in such a way that it looked great. To this day, she has no idea what her real cake looked like."

The bottom line is that it doesn't matter how organized and independent you are, big Jewish weddings are not meant to be put together by one person.

In the end, my chupah was emotional, the reception was beautiful, the band was amazing, the food was delicious, my husband was gorgeous and thanks to Risa, I was able to truly be there for all those precious moments that I'll never forget.

The first dance.

Brides

Hiring a planner helps with the pre-wedding jitters

By JENNIFER BRINDER
Special to The CJN

Planning our wedding has had its ups and downs. When we got engaged, I thought, really, how hard could it be to plan a wedding? All I need is a dress, an aisle, and a man. Boy was I wrong! I really thought I knew my fiancé before the planning. David is organized and likes to be in control. I was prepared to discuss, plan, and even argue over each and every item. But to my surprise, David's response has been, "It's your day" and I have been able plan to my heart's desire. I even surprised myself, because when given the freedom to do what you please, where do you begin?

I never knew about all the little things like place cards, aufrufs, and kippot. Having a wedding planner has made planning this wedding that much easier. From the venue, to the band, to the flowers – it all got done so quickly. From one bride to another, take my advice, book a wedding planner, and if you don't know one call mine, Sharon Goodman. She has been such a huge help and has made my life so much easier. The last thing a bride needs is to worry about the details, which is why you should pay someone to worry for you!

Jennifer Brinder and her consultant Sharon Goodman

As excited as I am for our wedding day, I am looking forward to the day after. Now that I think about it, it is actually a bit scary. Both David and I have only ever lived with our families, so there is a part of us that wonders when we get our house, what are we going to do from there? Writing this article really got me thinking. I even had to call David, and I think we came up with the perfect solution – scheduling! My mom will come Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays to do laundry. His mom will clean on Tuesdays and Thursdays. We figure after working so hard, they deserve the weekend off. As for eating, we hope they both deliver, and we'll make sure to have some good take-out places on speed dial.

I would love to be able to say I have no fears about our upcoming wedding, but I do have one. It may sound ridiculous, but in my head, I am terrified. It may not be what you would think, and it sure isn't something Sharon can help me with. It's not about starting on time, or people not showing up. It's the horah. I'm dreading being lifted in that chair, and it is something I have had nightmares about for years. Besides the fact I am somewhat scared of heights, I am terrified of being dropped. Can you imagine? The bride falls off the chair… it is not what I want people to remember as being the highlight of my wedding. I have already picked out the people who will lift me and made them promise to practice before hand.

In the end, this wedding will be the result of 437 days of planning. We looked at five photographers, had to change the date four times, went through three caterers, and I fell in love with two wedding dresses. In the end, I know it will be perfect. Because he is the only one for me.

Tories shut out of 416 but make inroads with Jewish voters

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF and JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporters

Stephen Harper has another minority government, and although the blue Tory wave was turned back in Quebec and Toronto, it appears the Conservative message managed to connect with Jewish voters.

Despite losing in several Liberal bastions in Montreal and ridings in the 416 area code, Conservative candidates came close to pulling off major upsets on election night – the first day of Sukkot– in some prominent, and traditionally Liberal, Jewish ridings.

The Conservatives touted themselves throughout the campaign as the only party with a staunchly pro-Israel record, repeating promises to the Jewish community that they would hold Canada back from the upcoming followup to the United Nations anti-racism conference and continue to work closely with the Jewish state on economic and security concerns.

They also pledged more than $3 million in funding for a pilot Security Infrastructure Project to help Jewish and other ethnic communities shore up security at places of worship and other communal buildings.

Stephen Harper

In York Centre, a riding that's 17 per cent Jewish and has been a Liberal stronghold more than 45 years, incumbent Ken Dryden was re-elected, but he faced stiff competition from neophyte Conservative candidate Rochelle Wilner, a past president of B'nai Brith Canada.

Dryden beat Wilner by just 2,090 votes, a tight race for him considering his more comfortable margin of victory in 2006, when he defeated Tory candidate Michael Mostyn by 9,640 votes.

To the south, the riding of St. Paul's was held firm by Liberal Carolyn Bennett, who defeated Conservative candidate Heather Jewell by more than 12,000 votes. Bennett last defended her riding against Peter Kent, defeating the Tory journalist-cum-candidate by more than 14,000 votes in 2006.

Another nail-biter for the Liberals involved the Toronto riding of Eglinton-Lawrence, where incumbent Joe Volpe was tested by Conservative candidate Joe Oliver.

The riding, which encompasses much of the Bathurst Street Jewish corridor, has a population that is 17 per cent Jewish and is home to bagel shops, numerous shuls and other Jewish businesses.

In the end, Volpe pulled away from Oliver and downed the Conservative candidate by just 2,260 votes. The result was in stark contrast to Volpe's 2006 election result, when he won the riding by more than 11,000 votes over Conservative Peter Coy.

Bodybuilding icon Ben Weider dies

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Tributes poured in over the weekend for Montreal bodybuilding legend Ben Weider, who died unexpectedly on Oct. 17 at age 85 at the Jewish General Hospital.

But upon his passing, Weider, who cut an upright and cultured figure, was remembered as much for his scholarship and absolute passion for French emperor Napoleon Bonaparte as he was, along with his brother Joe, for his business acumen in making bodybuilding an internationally recognized and practised avocation.

"It was his intensity when it came to Napoleon," commented Joe King, a veteran journalist who knew Weider for some 30 years. "I have a book out next spring [on prominent Montreal Jews] that devotes a whole chapter to him.

Ben Weider

"When you walked into his office, you just knew Napoleon dominated his life."

Ironically, Weider passed away just days prior to the planned official inauguration of a new, permanent gallery devoted to Napoleon at the Montreal Museum of Fine Arts. Some 60 objects from Weider's collection, which he wanted to remain in Montreal, form the heart of the gallery.

Weider also penned several scholarly books about his favourite subject, including a few that provided persuasive forensic evidence, using hair samples, that Bonaparte was murdered, such as The Murder of Napoleon (1982), and Assassination at St. Helena Revisited (1995).

Last bazaar evokes fond memories

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Judy Winberg is embarking on a labour of love.

The chair of the 1995 Hadassah Bazaar is working on a display of bazaar memories in honour of the last-ever bazaar – now called the CHW Toronto Bazaar – to be held Oct. 29 at the National Trade Centre at Exhibition Place.

Winberg, whose mother Doodie Libman was bazaar chair in 1979 – the only other mother-daughter bazaar chairs are this year's chair, Barbi Benjamin Levitt, and her mother, Penny Benjamin, who was chair in 1981 – said she can't just "let the bazaar go. I have to give it a proper and deserved goodbye."

While putting together the display, she said, she noticed the changes the bazaar has gone through since its inception in 1924 at a downtown Yonge Street store.

"In 1937, the bazaar moved to Varsity Arena, and it included a fashion show, a beautiful baby photo contest, and 'Jewish' food, such as potato latkes and chopped liver," Winberg said.

"They raised an incredible $5,800 that year, and the funds were directed to the Agricultural School for Girls at Nahalal, to house and educate new female immigrants in farming techniques."

Throughout the 1940s, Winberg said, Hadassah-WIZO members were heavily involved in the war effort, and as merchandise donations fell because of the war, they compensated by adding more prizes for raffles. They also featured demonstrations on cooking with wartime rations.

"In 1943, they raised more than $10,000," she said.

In 1949, the bazaar moved to the Automotive Building at the Canadian National Exhibition, where it stayed until it moved to its current home in 2004. By 1957, with revenue of $87,000, it was billed as the largest annual bazaar in the world.

In honour of the 50th bazaar in 1974, then-Toronto mayor David Crombie named Oct. 23, 29 and 30 as Hadassah Bazaar Days.

Winberg said the display will be featured at this year's bazaar, and at 2:30 p.m., there will be a cake-cutting ceremony with past bazaar chairs. "We're inviting them all back so we can honour them."

Winberg's own bazaar memories go back to when she was a young girl and her mother would bring her back doll clothes. "I began working there when I was in high school, and now my daughter is a Hadassah member."

Ending the bazaar is a sign of the times, she said. "People feel sad, but 84 years is a good run. We can't feel sad about that."

Gail Klebanoff, who was chair in 1973, said that in those years, "we were the only game in town. There were no flea markets, no dollar stores – we were it."

Kent beats Kadis in Thornhill

Liberal stronghold changes hands

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

In what may have been the most surprising result in this year's election, the Liberal stronghold of Thornhill fell to the Conservatives.

The riding had been Liberal since its creation in 1996 out of parts of two other ridings, and it had been held by incumbent Susan Kadis since 2004.

On election night, Kadis lost to Conservative star candidate Peter Kent, a former broadcast journalist at CBC and Global, losing by 5,212 votes and garnering just 39 per cent of the vote compared to Kent's 49 per cent.

The riding has a significant number of Jews – an estimated 32,000, comprising roughly one-third of the area, making it likely the most Jewish riding in the country – who were seemingly lured away from voting Liberal by a combination of uncertainty about party leader Stéphane Dion's economic plan and the promise of continued strong Tory support for Israel.

Speaking to The CJN last Friday after his victory, Kent said he has spent a lot of time speaking to constituents about their concerns.

"I thank all the voters of Thornhill, a very diverse community, for their trust and confidence," he said. "I'm determined to be an effective voice in Ottawa. But the top [issue] for Thornhillers right now is obviously [maintaining] a steady hand on the economic tiller."

Kadis, who is Jewish, did not return calls by The CJN's deadline.

However, in her concession speech on election night, she congratulated Kent, thanked her supporters, and predicted that the Liberals would retake the riding in the future.

"It's been an honour and a privilege to represent Thornhill, one of the best ridings in Canada," Kadis told supporters. "All of you mean so much to me and my family. Your support and care means so much to me now. I believe Thornhill will be red again."

Voter turnout in the riding was a lowly 57 per cent of registered constituents.

Speaking to reporters afterward, Kadis wouldn't say whether she'd run again in the riding in the next election.

A report last week in Vaughan Today quoted Kadis as saying: "I will continue to do whatever I can to help strengthen our community and country at the same time. You know I'm there for you, just as you've been there for me."

Peter Kent

The report also said Kadis has ruled out a run for the mayor's office in Vaughan as a possible career turn.

Asked if Kadis had spoken to him after the election, Kent said his campaign office received a call from her on election night, "but we didn't connect. I returned the call and left a message… congratulating her on a well-fought, civil campaign."

Kent said he understands how Kadis feels, because he lost the 2006 election in the mid-town riding of St. Paul's to Liberal Carolyn Bennett by more than 14,000 votes, before running in Thornhill this year.

He added that he felt badly for Kadis, because she was "lumbered by a leader who did not enjoy the confidence of voters in the country. But she still made a very good showing. That's a tribute to her past service to Thornhill."

Regarding his Jewish constituents – whom Kent called a "community within a community" – he said that since moving north to run in Thornhill, he has held discussions with people in synagogues, restaurants and delis in the riding about the "issues that are important to them and the things they want me to argue on their behalf, whether they are local or international issues."

A righteous man of rescue

From the editor's desk

I have known his children, three sons, for 40 years. Each inherited aspects of the multi-faceted, deeply ingrained goodness of their father.

Last week they, their mother and their families unveiled the monument marking their father's grave. In keeping with their father's modesty and aversion to the spotlight of public attention, only a handful of friends were invited to the simple ceremony. The rabbi spoke briefly and poignantly of the character of the man at whose final resting place we had assembled.

Though it was only mid-morning, the sky above was so deeply blue it was almost sapphire. The sun warmed us on one of those invigorating, splendidly clear autumn days when profoundly rich colours and calm, comforting climate magically fused to press upon us a feeling that it was indeed good to be alive.

There was thus a sense that morning, more of privilege than of sadness. For we had all known him. The man whose grave was now officially marked, had pressed into our lives similar feelings of privilege and rare pieces of permanent wisdom.

Statesmen, diplomats, scholars, businessmen, philanthropists, politicians, people of high and low station, sought his counsel, and foremost, his friendship.

One day many years ago, I bounded into the home that he and his wife had typically, generously opened to me too, seeking his eldest son. In my enthusiasm, I interrupted a conversation with a visitor in his living room whom he introduced as Avraham Harman, president of Hebrew University.

Before becoming president of the university, Harman had been Israel's first consul general in Montreal, a member of the Israeli delegation to the United Nations, consul general in New York, and then ambassador to the United States.

Such were the men and women who came by his home.

Unfazed by my sudden arrival on the scene, he invited me to meet his guest and to join in the conversation. Of course, I added nothing of substance or interest, or likely even marginal relevance, to their discussion. But, ever the gentlemen and always gracious, he politely asked my opinion from time to time.

He was born in a small rural community near Toronto six years before the Great Depression of 1929. His upbringing through those harsh economic times could not have been easy. But the harsh economy was only a harbinger of a far darker period for the world merely 10 years later.

His personality was forged on the steel-hard anvil of World War II. What emerged was a man with a highly developed sense of duty, honour, responsibility and unshakable belonging to the unique and marvellous Jewish People.

Too young to join in the fighting in Europe in 1939, he enlisted in the Canadian Armed Forces at his first opportunity.

After the war, he went to Europe to work for the American Joint Distribution Committee (JDC) to help rescue, house and feed as many of the surviving Jews as possible. There he met and fell in love with the woman who would become his wife. She was a German Jew, who, along with her family, had hidden in France during the war.

In later years, I frequently asked him to talk of what he had seen in Europe after the war, of his role in helping mend and restore to the world of the living the innumerable broken souls of Jewish weary and wounded.

But he was always reluctant to do so. I could never pierce his armour of self-effacement. The light had to shine on others, not on him.

He did however, refer me to a book called The Secret Alliance (Farrar, Straus & Giroux) in which the award-winning journalist Tad Szulc chronicles the "extraordinary story of the rescue of the Jews" after World War II.

In the chapter titled No Place to Go, No Place to Return, the book bears witness to some of the events in which he took part.

"A whole new reality emerged after VE-Day – that of the displaced persons. Millions of starving, homeless and disoriented DPs [displaced persons] were let loose across liberated Europe..."

Describing the condition of Jews returning from Nazi death camps and from exile in Soviet Asia, Szulc quotes a high JDC official: "They come in from those boats – boats that start their journey in Odessa, come through Naples and then into Marseilles – and then they find their way into our Paris office. They are literally without anything. They are without clothing, they are without shoes, they have no place to spend the night. They haven't a sou in their pockets. They have nothing to look forward to... many of them are swollen with hunger. Many of them cannot walk a step. Many of them need immediate medical attention and care. They cannot be put on their own... they come in walking like ghosts, like shadows..."

Szulc dedicated his book in part to the men and women who worked for the JDC after World War II, the "righteous people of rescue."

The greatest part of the inheritance that my generation has received from the generation of our parents is the honour and privilege of having been their children.

May these few words in tribute to a humble, heroic, righteous man of rescue be as a stone among the many placed tenderly on his grave, in remembrance and deep gratitude. –MBD

JORDAN AND ISRAEL SIGN A TREATY OF PEACE

On October 26, 1994, Jordan and Israel signed a historic peace treaty at an undisputed point along the border between the two countries in Wadi al-Araba, in the Arava valley of Israel, north of Eilat and near the Jordanian border, some 13 kilometres north of Aqaba and Eilat. Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, left, and Jordanian Prime Minister Abdelsalam al-Majali, seated at right beside U.S. President Bill Clinton, signed the treaty. Israeli President Ezer Weizman is pictured standing behind Clinton and alongside Jordan's King Hussein. Prince Hassan is standing beside his brother the king. Multifaith peacewalk unites Jews, Muslims

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Rabbi Lynn Gottlieb doesn't just talk the talk of peaceful reconciliation between Muslims and Jews, she literally walks the walk.

The Berkeley-based rabbi, who serves as the spiritual leader of the Danforth Jewish Circle (DJC), is the co-founder of the Muslim-Jewish Peacewalk.

She recently brought her brand of reconciliation between Muslims and Jews to Toronto's east end, where she co-lead the inaugural Danforth Multifaith Peacewalk.

This event, which was co-sponsored by the DJC, the Pakistani Community Centre (PCC), the Madina Masjid Islamic Centre and the Glen Rhodes and Eastminster United churches, drew more than 200 people from the participating congregations.

Before the walk, the group gathered at Glen Rhodes United Church – it is also home to the PCC – on Gerrard Street East, in the heart of Little India.

In his welcome speech, Rev. Douglas DuCharme, the minister of Hope United Church, credited Toronto-Danforth MPP Peter Tabuns, who was in attendance, for bringing the Muslim and Jewish communities together.

Pakistani community elder Abdul Aziz blessed the group and chanted from the Qur'an. Imam Syed Zaki Baqri of Pickering told the group that peace was a gift from God. "The wisdom of God is to know different nations."

Rabbi Gottlieb said that she, along with her U.S. peace dialogue partner, whom she referred to as Haji, had initiated the Muslim-Jewish Peacewalk in the spring 2002 as a means of fostering reconciliation between Muslims and Jews in response to Sept. 11.

To date, there have been similar walks in 17 other cities across the United States and Canada.

"To pursue peace is a religious obligation," Rabbi Gottlieb said. "Walking together is sacred. It is a an act of public witness that people of different faiths can live together in peace."

She urged people to mingle with others from different faith backgrounds.

A procession, which formed behind people carrying a huge white, cloth peace dove and placards advocating peace, made its way west along Gerrard Street, past stores selling incense and spices and boutiques displaying silk saris.

The walkers proceeded north on Greenwood Avenue en route to the Madina Masjid Islamic Centre on Danforth Avenue, passing through a neighbourhood where restaurants and grocery stores offering hallal meat abound.

Shoes were removed and head-scarves were donned before the group entered Madina Masjid, the mosque attended by many PCC members.

People were ushered upstairs to a large second-floor reception room, where they were introduced to congregation president Hanif Shaikh and Imam Abdullah Nooruddin. The imam spoke about Islamic values and beliefs.

Following some brief words from Beaches-East York MPP Michael Prue, people were served vegetarian samosas and a milk sweetened and coloured with red-rose syrup.

The procession then continued west to Eastminster United Church – it also serves as the spiritual home of the DJC – where participants were welcomed by Rev. Sarah Bercier-Miller and Rev. Daniel Bogert-O'Brien.

After Cantor Lisa Kent's singing of Avinu Malkeinu and Oseh Shalom, the interfaith service culminated with participants dancing around the sanctuary hand in hand.

They celebrated the walk with a communal feast that included plates of bagels and cream cheese, and platters overflowing with spicy potato samosas. A trio of DJC musicians playing jazz and show tunes added to the festive mood of this gathering.

Karen Robbins, a DJC board member and the event organizer, said she was thrilled with the outcome. "There was so much goodwill and respect. To see dancing in the aisles with everyone holding hands, I could not have hoped for more."

She said planning for the event began six months earlier when she and fellow DJC member Avrum Jacobson approached Tabuns, their MPP, about finding a way to start a dialogue with the local Muslim community. Tabuns introduced them to the PCC leaders Tasleem Rias, vice-chair of Asian Communities Council of Canada and council chair Farukh Qazi.

"They were very open," recalled Robbins. "And they were so hospitable. Every time we met, they provided Kashmiri tea and samosas, even during Ramadan when they were fasting."

Now to the task of governing

The most eloquent of all voices is that of "the people" when they "speak" in an election. While there may be difficulties and ambiguities in carrying out the result of an election, there is no ambiguity with the result itself: parties assume their posts in dutiful obeisance to the command of the electorate.

Last week Canadians voted to send 143 Conservatives, 76 Liberals, 50 Bloc Québecois and 37 New Democrats to the House of Commons. No Green party candidates were elected.

We congratulate him and his colleagues in the Conservative party on their hard-fought election victory.

We also congratulate all the candidates of all the parties who participated in the election. As we in the West know, democracy is strengthened through the participation of its citizens. Offering oneself as a candidate is, of course, the highest, most demanding, most exposed form of participation in the process. Thus, we commend and thank all who ran.

All who won however must now set about the important task of governing the country.

We, therefore, join with Canadian Jewish Congress co-presidents Sylvain Abitbol and Rabbi Reuven Bulka in urging "a spirit of co-operation among all parties in the new Parliament to best deal with issues of critical significance to Canada and the international community."

Those issues are many, and as events prove over and over again, domestic issues are not easily, if at all, severable from international ones. For example, and most obviously, the global economic situation directly affects the Canadian economy and our ability to deal with matters of health, education, welfare, poverty, environment, industry and trade. Similarly, the global battle against terrorism affects our domestic vigilance against terrorism and terrorists. All such issues of critical significance will require principled, clear, adroit handling by the prime minister and the government.

These troubled and difficult times do indeed require a "spirit of co-operation" among all leaders and parties, less partisan cause and more common cause, less purely regional allegiance and more overtly national allegiance.

However, as Jeffrey Simpson astutely pointed out in last Saturday's Globe and Mail, inter-party co-operation may be more hope than reality due to the the recurring dominance in Quebec of the separatist Bloc Québecois.

But our fervent wish is to the contrary.

Our hope is that the new Parliament will be a place where our legislators govern with wisdom, courage, courtesy and regard for the highest good of all Canadians.

Former Israeli president Yitzhak Navon, touted as a possible leadership candidate for the Labor Party, blamed the decline in the numbers of Diaspora Jews on assimilation and the declining birth rate. Speaking in Toronto at a private meeting of Jewish leaders, he deplored the fact that too many Diaspora children do not receive a Jewish education.

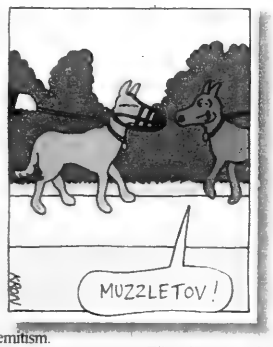
Claims Conference wrongly depicted

As a member of the board of the Material Claims Conference and as a Holocaust survivor, I was extremely troubled to read "Films expose the problem of impoverished Holocaust survivors in Israel" (CJN, Oct. 16).

I have been on the board for two years, and in that time I have seen hundreds of thousands of dollars distributed to impoverished survivors around the world. I have seen directors of the board, all survivors themselves, devote thousands of volunteer hours to better the lives of our needy brothers and sisters. I would never serve an organization like the one that is so wrongly depicted in this film.

Sadly, the article fails to examine the marked biases and distortions made in the film. This information is readily available on the Claims Conference website at www.claimscon.org in the form of a detailed, 28-page rebuttal. Most importantly, omitted in the article is the fact that the Claims Conference has filed a defamation action against Orly Vilnai-Federbush, Guy Meroz and Shamayim Hafakot, the creators and producers of the movie.



The article also omits the fact that key Holocaust survivor groups around the world have condemned these films. They have asserted that the filmmakers go beyond distortion of the truth, presenting claims that may be considered libelous and could prove inflammatory, and may even result in anti-Semitism.

I ascribe to the same view and urge CJN readers to read the proof on the website for themselves. Canadian Jewish Holocaust Survivors, along with Canadian Jewish Congress, has urged the Toronto Jewish Film Festival not to show the film. We have yet to receive a response from the festival.

We are extremely disappointed that our concerns about the damage this film could inflict on survivors, who may wrongly believe they were duped by an organization that was established to assist them, have been ignored. The fact that the article also ignores the controversy and concerns surrounding these films adds insult to injury for Holocaust survivors around the world.

Discrimination against Sephardim

Rabbi Yehiel Ben Ayon claims that "virtually all top-notch Ashkenazi yeshivot maintain quotas on how many boys of Sephardi origin they are prepared to accept" ("Rooting out an ugly prejudice," CJN, Sept. 25).

I went to the overseas program of Yeshivat Hesder Petach Tikva. There were more than 150 students. About 60 were in the army, and within the group of the other 90 students, I am positive that there was no "quota" – firstly, because about 40 per cent were not Ashkenazi, and secondly, because of what the Rosh Yeshiva HaRav Yuval Cherlow said when he spoke about the differences between Sephardi and Ashkenazi Jews. He spoke about the traditional differences in mindset and religious practice, and about the different historical manner of Jewish learning and teaching and the results in today's reality. He also spoke about the different effects of the Enlightenment on the different communities and the different ways in which they treated those that strayed from the tradition.

Rabbi Cherlow also mentioned that he had an affinity for many aspects of the Sephardi tradition, and he recounted a story about a study group, mostly of Sephardim, that he would go to late at night to study the teachings of Rabbi Nachman of Breslow. It was clear that the teachings of this spiritual leader arose from the Ashkenazim and had managed to "cross over" and be studied by Sephardim. However, Rabbi Cherlow did not state that, because the fact that Sephardim also study Ashkenazi texts was obvious to the group he was speaking to, of which many were Sephardi. Rather, he used the story to describe some of the differences in the traditional mindset of Sephardim and how it affected Halachah.

I am sure that Yeshivat Hesder Petach Tikva is not a radical exception. There are many fine yeshivot that I am confident do not discriminate against Sephardim. I ask Rabbi Ben Ayon to ask himself if his information about the yeshivot is correct.

Staying married through thick and thin

I would just like to say to your columnist Sandie Benitah, that there are many people who marry for love and stay married for many years through thick and thin ("Marrying for love," CJN, Sept. 11). And the marriage strengthens as the years go by.

They learn to live with their spouse's meshugasin, raise loving, well-brought-up and happy families and are not cynical at the end of their lives. And if one partner dies, the loneliness is terrible to the surviving spouse, however he or she shows themselves to the world as getting along in life.

So, Sandie, marry for love and stay that way for many, many years.

Live and learn: confessions of a Jewish professor

By ED MORGAN

It's not often that educators get to write about what we've learned recently, instead of what we've taught. But for me, after 20 years as a professor, this has been one of my more eye-opening summer and fall seasons.

In recent months, I have been invited to participate in two conferences, one put on by the Ontario Bar Association and the other by Osgoode Hall Law School. Both are squarely in my fields – the former dealing with freedom of speech and human rights law, and the latter dealing with law, democracy and the Middle East conflict. I'll admit that I was pleased to be invited – what more does a professor want than to pontificate to audiences in his field?

Ed Morgan

My problem is that each of these conferences has demonstrated that, contrary to my preferred self-image, I can occasionally be wrong. The OBA's conference, which explores the recent human rights case against writer Mark Steyn and Maclean's magazine, shows that my views on the regulation of hateful speech may have been misguided. The Osgoode Hall conference, which poses the question "Israel/Palestine: One State or Two?" shows that my faith in rational dialogue and academic debate may also have been misguided.

Let me examine each of them in turn.

A lawyer from the OBA called me early in the fall term to invite me to speak on a panel composed of myself and another law professor who is a respected board member of the Canadian Civil Liberties Association. My colleague was to advocate the position of free speech for which her organization is well known, and I was to advocate for the curtailment of prejudicial speech presumably – although this was not said to me directly – due to my long service with Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and the human rights positions for which that organization is well known. The event was to be moderated by former Toronto mayor and chair of the Ontario Human Rights Commission, Barbara Hall.

The issue of speech has hit me hard over the past few months. My legal career began with the issue – the first public interest case I ever worked on two decades ago was the prosecution of Alberta teacher Jim Keegstra, when I was privileged to work under John Laskin representing Congress. I was national legal counsel of CJC by the time the federal Human Rights Commission came to grip with Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel, and I was national president of CJC when we put our convictions to work supporting deportation proceedings against Rwandan broadcaster and genocide propagandist Leon Mugasera. I took seriously the admonition we often hear that the Holocaust began not with deeds but with words.

This past spring, I was asked to defend the leadership of Hasbara Fellowships at a York University discipline hearing. Hasbara is an activist Jewish student organization that decided, in the face of relentless anti-Israel events at York, to fight bad speech not with censorship, but with more and better speech. Instead of asking for a ban on anti-Israel activities, they counter with strong pro-Israel events – often with a dose of in-your-face chutzpah. Fighting bad speech with good speech has turned out to be the right way to go, and I'm happy to say that we've had some legal success with the strategy.

The complaints filed against Hasbara allege that the very image of the blue-and-white Israeli flag appearing on the group's pamphlets is hateful and must be banned. The complaints filed against Maclean's allege that the very discussion of radical Islam contained in that publication is hateful and must be banned. That anyone can take either complaint seriously shows how dangerous the suppression of speech in the name of anti-hate can be. It turns out, if we read our history correctly, that the Holocaust began not only with words, but with book burning. Once we go down the road of censorship for the sake of promoting tolerance, we may soon be standing at the heights of intolerance.

Having learned that the Keegstras and Zundels of yesteryear have morphed into the Mark Steyns and the Hasbara students of today, I had to graciously decline the OBA's conference invitation. But then came the Osgoode Hall invitation to sit on an advisory committee for the conference being planned on "One State or Two." What's a free speech ba'al tshuvah to do?

I harbour no illusions about the actual debate. The idea of "two states" embraces Jewish and Palestinian self-determination and is at the heart of any potential peace process, while the notion of "one state" is deployed by Israel's enemies as a rhetorical tactic to undermine the Jewish state. But in a U.S. presidential election season in which Joe Biden can take on Sarah Palin and Barack Obama can square off against John McCain, I told myself that we should at least engage the debate rather than shut it down. With a view to being one of the few pro-Zionist members of a background advisory committee, I decided to fight the fight from the inside, trying to ensure that the conference is one of engagement rather than polemics.

But my one state/two state, red state/blue state analogy is turning out to be as naïve as a Dr. Seuss rhyme. The core group that thought up the conference are perfectly good scholars at Osgoode Hall and Queen's University who hold a genuine interest in debating alternative forms of democracy in the Israeli and Palestinian context. But the guests are starting to outnumber the hosts, and the cynical edge of the "one state" crowd is showing as the proposed speakers start to bear their anti-Israel teeth.

In the first place, committee members have been proposing speakers who are behind such publications as the "Electronic Intifada." This is a website whose politics are, as the name suggests, thoroughly antagonistic to everything Israeli. In fact, it is so emphatic in its opposition that a recent lead article denounced Paul McCartney for the sin of playing a concert in Tel Aviv. Politics and policies aren't the problem; the Israeli audience is. The irony is that those who seem to dislike Israeli society the most also advocate strenuously for an all-inclusive "one state" (which would presumably be a very distasteful one to them).

Worse than that, some committee members have been proposing speakers whose credentials boast of their prominence in the "Boycott Israel" campaign. Here, even the most ardent free speecher would have to draw the line, if for nothing else than out of self respect. Could anything undermine the credibility of an event that bills itself as one of dialogue and engagement more than to try to "dialogue" and "engage" with boycotters?

For a conference such as Osgoode's to succeed, one needs speakers who genuinely grapple with the issues of political and legal theory and do so out of good faith, not cynicism. Personally, I have proposed keynotes – former Israeli chief justice Aharon Barak and novelist Amos Oz among them – who will demonstrate that having a distinctively Jewish national character does not undermine the possibility of liberal democracy, and that when it comes to the "two state" model, the Palestinians would do well to try to emulate the Israeli combination of national distinctiveness and a liberal ethic.

If the conference turns into a sophisticated exploration of issues of nationality and democracy, it will have been a worthwhile endeavor to engage from within.

But if the event continues the trend of giving boycotters a platform for anti-Israel grandstanding, I will not be there. I'll be supporting a counter-event designed to confront bad speech with good. I learned that from the students at Hasbara this past summer.

Opinions

Distressed at not being frantic

Now that the general election and the High Holidays are over, I'd like to voice my disappointment with Stephen Harper and his staff. Though I'm an involved member of the Jewish community, I didn't receive a Rosh Hashanah card from the prime minister. If my surname isn't Jewish enough, my first name is, despite its idiosyncratic spelling. I even subscribe to Jewish publications, including this one.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

Unlike some unaffiliated Jews who got a card, I wouldn't have been upset about alleged ethnic profiling. Instead, I would have displayed the card on my mantel as a trophy to impress visitors and imply that the sender and I are close friends. But it was not to be.

My disappointment confuses me. Do I still live in the ghetto and, therefore, need those in power to patronize me? Or am I so integrated that I've no qualms about being singled out as a Jew for attention in high places?

I suspect the former, but I hope for the latter. I'd like to see myself as being as Canadian as possible under the circumstances, convinced that my Jewishness has no negative connotations whatsoever.

Perhaps I'm not the only one to be so confused. When Harper called leaders of Canadian Jewry to tell them that the election would be held on the first day of Sukkot, they seemed to have accepted his explanation without demur. Are they also in the ghetto and thus intimidated by power? Or are they so acculturated that they believe civic duty to come before Jewish observance?

They accepted the compromise of early voting. I, too, voted without violating my religious practices and cast my ballot in favour of a good friend who ran in my riding. He doesn't send me Rosh Hashanah cards, either, by the way. Although my vote was in no way decisive, he was re-elected, and I'm pleased.

I'm probably being deprived of attention in high places because I'm not part of the circle that insiders describe as FRANs (friends, relatives, acquaintances and neighbours). Unlike me, FRANtics did make it onto Harper's Jewish list. This upsets me even more, for I thought that I was part of a recognized Jewish network and that people who matter would know about me.

I might have remained blissfully ignorant of all of this if not for a Globe and Mail article that cited indignant, marginal Jewish card recipients who apparently weren't as anonymous as they had hoped.

I can't judge the effect of the article on the Conservative party's mailing list, but it has made me feel very unsettled, for it has challenged both my sense of Jewish identity and my ambition regarding my place in Canadian society.

American politics, in Canada

With the Canadian and American election campaigns overlapping, one trend became noticeable among Jewish voters. Of the presidential and prime ministerial candidates in both countries, it seemed that John McCain has taken a clear lead – not in the U.S. polls, which show him falling behind, but among Canadian Jewish students.

Justin Dahan in Ottawa

Recently, I spotted a Canadian Jewish student sporting a McCain T-shirt. In fact, in downtown Ottawa, Canada's capital, I've seen students wearing countless shirts with pictures of both American candidates, yet I've seen none with the faces of Tory leader Stephen Harper, Liberal chief Stéphane Dion or NDP head Jack Layton.

Those who don shirts that express their political views obviously consider themselves politically savvy, or at least knowledgeable enough to wear their views on their sleeves (pardon the poor pun).

But why do they feel the need to express their views about an election in which their opinion is largely irrelevant?

While the phenomenon of Canadians paying more attention to American politics is evident throughout Canada, Jews perhaps put even more importance on the U.S. vote than on Canadian elections because of their affiliation with Israel. As a result, many Jewish students support McCain and Harper without knowing much about the opposition.

Students are more likely to vote without a full understanding of all the candidates, because many laws and policies don't affect them yet, aside from those relating to tuition fees and education issues.

Also, students sometimes like to pretend to be political, but for the most part, they're apathetic.

It's only natural for Jews to support Israel, but the only qualm I have with taking that position is that it shouldn't lead them to pay more attention to U.S politics than to goings-on north of the border.

Jewish students ought to focus more on Canadian elections. While it's true that the U.S. vote is more important when it comes to the defence of Israel, Canadians don't have any sway over the American election.

Asher Farber, a Jewish music student at the University of Ottawa, explained his views on why Jews feel the need to track the U.S. election more closely than an election in their own backyard.

"The upcoming American election is much more important on a global scale than the Canadian one."

While that is no doubt true, the Canadian election obviously has more direct importance for Canada.

Many Jews support Harper, especially because of comments such as the ones he has consistently made since the Second Lebanon War, in which Israel fought Hezbollah.

In October 2006, he said, "When it comes to dealing with a war between Israel and a terrorist organization, this country and this government cannot and will never be neutral."

He put his full support behind Israel.

Comments such as these have given Harper often unbridled support from Canadian Jews, but Dion, the Liberal leader, has also stood behind the Jewish state recently, attending pro-Israel rallies in Toronto and Montreal. Of course, he took heat from some Liberals who enjoy accusing Israel of being an apartheid state. These comments are based on Dion's hypocrisy: in 2006 he made, and later defended, anti-Israel comments regarding the war.

That's the game of politics though, isn't it? Dion has recognized the importance of Jewish support and is now trying to show support for Israel in order to gain Jewish votes so as to compete more effectively against Harper in certain ridings.

Perhaps another reason Canadians pay more attention to American politics is that they feel fairly at home with the two frontrunners, who both have expressed explicit support for Israel.

Or perhaps they are more concerned about global issues and the economy, like Asher Farber.

As for me, I'll keep a close eye on the U.S. election, but I'll focus more on Canadian elections, where my vote actually counts.

Change is needed

We exist in a rather precarious position with regard to the upcoming American federal elections – removed from agency and voice in the electoral process yet mesmerized by the sheer theatricality of it all – and still the debates between candidates often take on new meanings from such a vantage point. Nuances that would otherwise elude our perception seem even more pertinent.

Jesse Mintz in Halifax

Take, for example, the vice-presidential debate earlier this month. Foreign policy played a prominent role in the debate – second only to the domestic economic woes. In terms of the Middle East in general and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict in particular, buzzwords flew from both podiums, as Republican Sarah Palin and Democrat Joe Biden worked to parallel and one-up each other in expressing their unflinching support for Israel.

That is all well and good.

And yet, something was missing. Amidst the crossfire of words and phrases like sovereignty, right to national defence, two-state solution and non-proliferation of nuclear arms, the word Palestine, and, for that matter, the words Palestinian people, were obviously and inescapably missing.

Contentious phrases such as "Israeli occupation" and "settlements" went unused for obvious politically pragmatic reasons, but surely, innocuous and egalitarian notions – notions that go hand in hand with the accepted platform of the two-state solution – such as the existence of the Palestinian people themselves and recognition of their base role would creep their way into the discussion as a minimum means of identifying the other half of the Israeli-Palestinian question.

These purposeful political evasions, however, should come as no surprise, as they fit the bill, at least cursorily, of the administration's last eight years of policy.

Democracy – forced down the throat of several Middle Eastern countries either legally and morally or unlawfully and iniquitously – is the stated goal of American foreign policy in theory. In reality, though, it remains so only insofar as it serves the administration's international purposes. Along those lines, the American government regards Fatah as a legitimate voice of the Palestinian people, while Hamas, despite the fact that it was given its mandate through democratic elections, remains on the periphery of the peace process.

While Israelis are critical of the place Hamas holds atop Palestinian society for its failure to curtail violence, Palestinians do the same with both the Israeli and American governments for their failure to dismantle settlements and observe international boundaries.

For as many years as I can recall, American politicians have touted the "road map" peace plan as the most promising means through which Israelis and Palestinians can march, hand in hand, toward peace and stability. Yet, both of the candidates merely reinforced the now standard trope of American policy regarding Israel as representing the moral compass – indeed, the only compass – in the Middle East.

This understanding of the predicament, while appealing to Zionists both on paper and on a nationally televised debate, merely serves to further the polarized entrenchment of the two sides. We must understand that by further marginalizing the agency of the Palestinian people, we succeed, not in furthering our goals, but only in creating more disenfranchised, alienated enemies.

There is a deeply embedded hypocrisy in the paradigm through which many view the ongoing conflict. The incoming American president will have to work hard to erase the aftertaste of the George W. Bush administration and establish himself as truly dedicated to an equitable peace process – meaning, the honouring of promises on both sides of the bargaining table.

On a pressing level, the perception of Hamas itself has to change. Like them or not, they represent the will of the majority of the Palestinian people, and any national dialogue must include them in order to be legitimate.

The upcoming elections have been touted as ushering in a time of great change. Indeed, both presidential candidates are running on campaigns, genuine or not, that promise a new era of politics. If, however, change is around the corner, it must begin with the paradigms through which we view the conflict.

If, as Biden claims, he has been Israel's best friend in Congress, and if, as Palin holds, she is dedicated to America's strongest democratic ally's pursuit of peace, then both candidates owe Israel and the Palestinian people more.

The Kirshner File

McCain expresses sympathetic views on Israel

John McCain, the scrappy Republican party contender for the U.S. presidency, likes to portray himself as a maverick who marches to the beat of his own drum, as well as a Washington outsider who has bucked his fellow Republicans and a restless reformer who is committed to change.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

And while all this may be true when it comes to some domestic issues, such as the environment and stem cell research, McCain is anything but an iconoclast on foreign policy, his strong suit as a candidate and debater. This is particularly true regarding his views on Israel, Israel's relationship with the United States, the Arab-Israeli conflict, the struggle for Iraq and Afghanistan, Iran's quest for a nuclear arsenal and its crusade against the Jewish state, and the role Hamas plays in the Middle East.

Representing the state of Arizona in the U.S. Senate, McCain is generally viewed as a neoconservative, yet he has been known to consult such traditional conservatives as Henry Kissinger, who was Richard Nixon's national security advisor and secretary of state when he was president of the United States.

McCain, who at 72 is the oldest-ever mainstream contender for the office of president, was in part formed by the war in Vietnam, which was divisive and unpopular and claimed the lives of more than 50,000 Americans.

The son of a Navy admiral who commanded the Pacific Fleet in the 1960s, McCain flew combat missions during that interminable war, and after he was shot down over Hanoi in 1967 on his 23rd mission, he spent the next 5-1/2 years in captivity.

The overarching lesson he learned from Vietnam was that it would be foolhardy for the United States to wage war without broad grassroots support. And so, after entering politics in 1982 and winning a seat in the House of Representatives, he opposed U.S. military interventions in a succession of hot spots from Lebanon and Haiti to Somalia and the Balkans.

But as he considered contesting the 2000 presidential race, he modified his views. Observers believe that he was influenced by the 1995 Serbian massacre of 5,000 Bosnian Muslims in Srebrenica, a Bosnian enclave policed by the NATO alliance.

From approximately that point onward, McCain talked about the need for a more muscular U.S. approach to foreign affairs to challenge autocratic "rogue" regimes ranging from Serbia to Iraq. It was important to confront them, he argued, because they were more likely to engage in ethnic conflicts and export terrorism and dangerous weapons. "Swift and sure" retribution could serve as a deterrent to other such states, he said.

With this in mind, McCain supported U.S. intervention in Afghanistan in the wake of Al Qaeda's terrorist attacks in the United States on Sept. 11, 2001. Believing that NATO's future is bound up with the outcome of the war in Afghanistan, he maintains that failure there "risks a reversion to its pre-9/11 role as a sanctuary for Al Qaeda terrorists with global reach, a defeat that would embolden Islamic extremists." Proceeding from that assumption, McCain holds that NATO must bolster its forces in Afghanistan. If NATO does not prevail, he told the Munich Conference on Security Policy last year, its credibility would suffer "a grievous blow."

One of the earliest supporters of regime change in Iraq, McCain was an early critic of the Bush administration's handling of the occupation after the U.S. invasion in March 2003. Often credited with having been one of the first major political figures to call for a U.S. troop "surge" to stabilize Iraq and defuse its insurgency, McCain has warned of the temptation "to wash our hands of a messy situation" and withdraw precipitously.

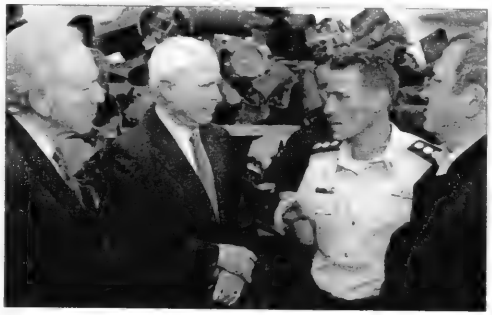
In sharp contrast to his Democratic opponent, Barack Obama, McCain opposes a timetable for a withdrawal from Iraq, contending that a hasty pullout may ignite an Iraqi civil war and consign Iraq to the status of a failed state, thereby increasing the chances of a regional war. "Preventing Iraq from falling into the hands of terrorists and extremists is only natural for the United States, and springs from the same interests and values that compel our close relationship with the state of Israel," he declared in a speech in 2007.

Like Obama, McCain is strongly pro-Israel.

"The bond between America and Israel is not just a strategic one, though that is important," McCain said last year, describing Israel as a "natural partner and ally."

He added, "The more profound tie between our two countries is a moral one. We are two democracies whose alliance is forged in our common values. To be proudly pro-American and pro-Israel is not to hold conflicting loyalties."

McCain's party platform on Israel is clear and unambiguous: "We affirm America's commitment to Israel's security and will ensure that Israel maintains a qualitative edge in military technology over any potential adversaries." Jerusalem should be Israel's "undivided capital."



Senator John McCain stands next to a collection of spent Qassam rockets in Sderot. He is flanked by U.S. Senator Joe Lieberman, his travelling companion, left, and Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak, right.

Israel must have "secure, defensible borders." Israel has a right to exist as a Jewish state and a right to defend itself.

As well, the platform states that the Palestinians should be granted statehood, but their leaders should reject terror, embrace the institutions and ethos of democracy and respect the rule of law. The fate of Palestinian refugees should be resolved justly and fairly through negotiations.

The Republican platform also urges the "continued isolation" of Hamas, which refuses to recognize Israel and seized the Gaza Strip from Fatah in June 2007. McCain, in a speech last year, said that the United States cannot have "normal relations" with a movement that "deliberately targets innocent Israeli civilians in an attempt to terrorize the Jewish population."

He was referring, of course, to Sderot and places like it adjacent to Gaza. Last March, in his capacity as a senator participating in a fact-finding trip, McCain visited Sderot, which was regularly bombarded by Palestinians until a ceasefire went into effect four months ago. Condemning Hamas, he said, "It's very difficult to negotiate with an organization that is dedicated to [the destruction of] your existence."

Shortly after he returned from Israel, a senior Hamas official, Ahmed Yousef, endorsed Obama. "We like Mr. Obama," he said," and we hope that he will win the election."

Embarrassed by the endorsement, Obama quickly distanced himself from Hamas, but McCain tried to make political hay out of it. "I think that the people should understand that I will be Hamas' worst nightmare," he said in a conference call with conservative bloggers. "I think it is very clear who Hamas wants to be the next president. If Senator Obama is favoured by Hamas, I think people can make judgments accordingly."

On Iran, McCain is just as firm. He has called for "progressively tougher political and economic sanctions" against Iran, which he recently branded as "a grave threat" to Israel should it acquire a nuclear arsenal. In a Sept. 26 debate with Obama, McCain called for "significant and and painful" sanctions to be imposed on Iran. The United States, he says, should not enter into high-level negotiations with the Iranian government until it ceases supporting groups like Hamas and Hezbollah and suspends efforts to enrich uranium. McCain has not explicitly advocated a military strike on Iran's nuclear installations, though the Republican platform keeps "all options" open.

But in a reference to threats uttered by Iran's president against Israel, McCain has said, "The United States of America can never allow a second Holocaust." McCain's vice-presidential nominee, Sarah Palin, has said that Washington should not "second guess" Israel if it decides to attack Iranian nuclear sites.

McCain's views on Israel and the Middle East satisfy many Jewish Americans, but in keeping with traditional voting patterns, the majority support Obama by a 57 per cent to 30 per cent margin, as an American Jewish Committee poll found recently.

B'nai Brith's LMOL to celebrate 60 years

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Since 1948, B'nai Brith's Leonard Mayzel Ontario Lodge (LMOL) has fulfilled its original mandate of "People Helping People."

On Sunday, Oct. 26, at the Paradise Ballroom, hundreds of members, friends and executive members of other B'nai Brith lodges will celebrate LMOL's 60th anniversary with a Diamond Jubilee Reunion.

"As we enter our seventh decade of service, we may lack the energy of the youth of 1948, but our commitment to the principals of B'nai Brith is stronger than ever," said Ralph Gan, the recently elected president of LMOL.

"We continue with an active program of community service and an outstanding array of social, cultural and athletic activities."

In 1948, when Jews were still reeling from the horrors of the Holocaust and the State of Israel was struggling to be born, a group of young men who belonged to Aleph Zadik Aleph (AZA) found that they were too old for B'nai Brith's youth chapter.

The AZA alumni petitioned B'nai Brith to grant them a charter for a new lodge. There was overwhelming resistance and a great deal of negotiation, but after much persuasion by Harry Pachter, a charter was granted.

There were 53 charter members, and Manny Hershberg was the lodge's first president.

From the lodge's inception, its members embarked on fundraising activities for a myriad of charities, volunteering their services to community agencies both Jewish and non-Jewish, and they formed athletic programs that set the foundation for the lodge's legendary growth.

"Let's put 1948 into perspective as to what was happening back then," said Bernie Jadd, a past president of LMOL and the chair and master of ceremonies for the 60th anniversary celebration.

"In sports, Toronto took the Stanley Cup in a series with Detroit Red Wings in four straight. Mackenzie King was prime minister of Canada, Robert H. Saunders was Toronto's mayor and the Academy Award-winning movie was Hamlet."

Working together to help those in need and participating in sports activities helped the members and their wives form lifelong friendships. Their bowling league remains active, and the lodge spearheaded a successful baseball team from its inception.

Over the past six decades, Jadd noted, LMOL has lent a helping hand to many projects, including Princess Margaret, Sunnybrook and Mount Sinai hospitals, as well as Baycrest, Muscular Dystrophy, the Canadian Cancer Society, the Toronto Police Ride Program, blood donor clinics, and holiday programs for seniors.

The lodge has been involved in fundraising for almost every major charity in the area. "Raising funds through bingos, Monte Carlos, auctions, dinner draws and golf tournaments, we are able to support B'nai Brith, along with foundations as varied as the Mandarin School, the Wellesley Hospital Burn Centre, Leah Posluns Theatre, and many more," Jadd said.

"We are very proud of the scope and depth of our fundraising efforts, and the dedicated chairmen who made this happen."

To commemorate the lodge's 60th anniversary and the 60th anniversary of the State of Israel, LMOL member Max Berg organized and led a tour of lodge members and friends to Israel.

Three founding charter lodge members will attend the Oct. 26 event: Hersh Buckstein, Morey Eckler and Arnold Weinberg. It will also feature an array of archival material.

The program will include a parade of past presidents, a candlelighting ceremony and the distribution of a souvenir book.

The keynote speaker will be Israeli Consul General Amir Gissin.

"The secret of our longevity is that this lodge was fortunate to have had leaders of vision with the ability to make things happen. All organizations today are struggling to keep members active and involved. LMOL has been advised that several members who left previously are rejoining," Jadd said.

Young fundraiser receives Mirvish Award

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

To Amanda Belzowsky, 11, recent recipient of the Anne and Ed Mirvish Achievement Award for Young People, lemonade is much more than a drink.

David and Anne Mirvish with 11-year-old Amanda Belzowsky.

Through her annual lemonade stand, Amanda has raised about $102,000 for the Heart & Stroke Foundation over the past 10 years.

Being honoured with this award is very special, she said, "because the Mirvishes are special people. They gave so much to the city, and for them to notice me and honour me is very exciting."

Amanda is also set to receive in November, the Association of Fundraising Professionals Greater Toronto Chapter's 2008 Outstanding Youth in Philanthropy Award, for which she was nominated by the Heart & Stroke Foundation.

She donates to the foundation, she said, "because everyone knows someone affected by heart disease."

One hundred per cent of this past spring's profits were earmarked for pediatric heart and stroke research, she said, because "I want to raise awareness that it is not only adults affected by this disease. People need to know that it even happens to babies."

That stand, her 10th, was in honour of her great-grandfather, David Dale, who died in December. "My grandmother and my great-grandfather both received artificial heart valves," Amanda said.

Planning for the event, which includes pony rides, an auction, cake, popcorn and hot chocolate – everything is donated – is challenging and interesting, said Amanda, "but I wait for the actual day all year long. It's more fun than my birthday."

She met Michael (Pinball) Clemens, CEO of the Toronto Argonauts, at another fundraiser, she said, "and he was so impressed with my efforts, he promised to drop by [this past year's] stand. He ended up staying three hours, and he donated box seats to the opening Argos game and a tour of the locker room, which we auctioned off."

She is getting her two-year-old brother, Joshua, involved in next year's lemonade stand, she said. "We're calling it Amanda's Lemonade Stand and Joshua's Cookie Corner. I want him to learn about sharing."

In Grade 6 at United Synagogue Day Schools, Bathurst campus, Amanda would like to meet some of the kids hospitalized for heart problems and, if possible, would like them to come to her stand.

"I would also like to visit some schools and teach students that they are never too little to do something big for the world. I want them to have a lemonade stand that supports any charity they believe in. That will make Toronto a better place," she said.

Amanda is starting to work on business proposals, she said, in order to attract some corporate sponsors. "That should raise our donations."

The website for Amanda's Lemonade Stand, www.amandaslemonade4heart.org, was created by Elizabeth Wright of Conceptual Design Management.com.

Prof holds class on holidays

A York University professor refused to cancel his lectures on Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur and repeated his opinion that the school's policy of closing down for the High Holidays discriminates against non-Jewish students.

History professor David Noble has spent the past four years arguing that the university's 34-year-old policy is illegal, because he contends it violates the Ontario Human Rights Code by giving preferential treatment to one religious group.

In November 2006, Noble, who is Jewish, filed a complaint with the Ontario Human Rights Commission (OHMC).

Last March, a report by a commission investigator said that York's "practice of not scheduling classes on Jewish High

Cotler pleased with his fifth electoral win

Last week, Volpe was one of the first Liberal MPs to suggest that party leader Stéphane Dion should resign over the party's dismal showing in this election.

"Clearly, it appears that nobody's going to give him the chance to [rebuild the party] and I'd like him to go out with some dignity," Volpe told CTV.

Over in Don Valley West, a riding with a 10 per cent Jewish population that encompasses the affluent Bridle Path and Leaside areas, as well as low-income areas such as Flemingdon and Thorncliffe Park, Rob Oliphant kept the riding Liberal red, but not by much.

Conservative candidate John Carmichael came within 2,671 votes of winning. By contrast, in 2006, the riding was won handily by the Liberals' John Godfrey, who defeated Carmichael by more than 10,000 votes.

The relatively safe Liberal riding of Willowdale – which has been held by the party since 1988 – was successfully defended by Martha Hall Findlay, who beat Conservative Jake Kams by 7,939 votes.

But the Liberal margin of victory was almost halved compared to the 2006 election, when Jim Peterson swept away Tory Jovan Boseovski by more than 14,000 votes.

In Richmond Hill, a riding where Jews make up six per cent of the population, the Liberals also managed to hang on, with candidate Bryon Wilfert beating Conservative Chungsen Leung by 5,185 votes.

Again, in contrast, Wilfert soundly beat Tory Joe Di Paola in 2006 by more than 11,000 votes.

In Montreal, Liberal MP Irwin Cotler was pleased with his fifth electoral win in Mount Royal, albeit with a reduced majority of almost 56 per cent. In the 2006 election, he took 65 per cent of the votes, which was then his lowest showing ever.

His closest contender, Conservative Rafael Tzoubari, was well back at just over 27 per cent of the ballots cast.

"I'm very pleased given that, regrettably, the Liberal popular vote [in Canada] was the lowest since Confederation," Cotler said. According to 2001 census data, 36 per cent of Mount Royal electors are Jewish.

Cotler managed to prevail despite a strong push to reward the Harper government for its pro-Israel stance and anti-Liberal opinion among certain Orthodox Jews because of the legalization of same-sex marriage while Cotler was justice minister.

He also noted that he didn't have the services of many of his Jewish volunteers through much of the campaign and on election day because of the holidays. Many drivers, for example, were not available to drive people to the polls.

The 52 per cent voter turnout was probably a historic low for Mount Royal. Cotler thinks that can be partially explained by the fact the election was held on the first day of Sukkot, and two of the three advance polls were on a Friday and Saturday.

"Those polls were so overcrowded that some people were waiting two or three hours to vote. A lot of people did not hang around, especially the elderly [who represent a high proportion of the riding]," he said. More than 7,400 people did vote in the advance polls in Mount Royal.

With Mount Royal having been Liberal since 1940, Cotler concedes many residents don't feel that their vote matters.

Cotler himself made a point of voting in an advance poll, hoping to "make a statement regarding the prime minister's failure to respect the principles that are the cornerstone of our democratic system," including minority rights. He also postponed his victory party to the following night, holding it in the sukkah at his home.

Cotler, 68, was first elected in 1999.

He said one of the first things he's going to do when Parliament resumes is table a bill to establish a "Speak No Evil Day," in honour of his late mother, who had no truck with lashon hara. He is hoping it will be unanimously adopted and that the House of Commons will set an example for all Canadians.

He is also planning to revive a couple of other private member bills that lapsed with the dissolution of Parliament, dealing with making Sudan and Iran accountable for, respectively, their crimes of genocide and incitement to genocide.

"I've got a full plate and I'm raring to go," he said.

The other Quebec Jewish MP, Liberal Raymonde Folco, also was returned for a fifth time in Laval-Les Îles with a comfortable plurality of 40 per cent, well ahead of the next closest competitor, the Bloc Québécois' Mohamedali Jetha.

Folco, 68, was first elected in 1997.

In Outremont, the turnout at advance polls – just over 2,200 – one of the lowest in the province, suggests the chassidic community of about 10,000 did not vote in large numbers.

On the prairies, in Winnipeg South Centre, an affluent federal riding with the largest number of Jewish voters – 6,000 according to the last census – in the three Prairie provinces, voters re-elected Anita Neville to her fourth term in Parliament.

The Jewish MP was the only one of three sitting Liberal MPs from Manitoba to survive election night. (In fact, she was one of just two Liberal MPs elected in the three Prairie provinces. The other was Ralph Goodale in Saskatchewan.)

"I am pleased with the outcome," Neville said. "I am delighted that my constituents endorsed me once again. We had a good team and ran a good campaign."

Neville also expressed her disappointment that a number of her Liberal colleagues were not re-elected.

Winnipeg South Centre has been a Liberal bastion since it was reconfigured to its present boundaries in 1988. Neville was first elected in 2000, succeeding Lloyd Axworthy, Canada's foreign minister during the Chrétien years, who had held the seat since 1988.

Despite a strong challenge from a Tory star candidate, former Winnipeg Blue Bomber kicker Trevor Kennerd, Neville increased her percentage of the vote to 43 per cent. Kennerd finished with 36 per cent of the vote.

On a national level, community leaders have expressed their desire to move forward and work with this second Tory government constructively.

Shoppers planned days around Hadassah Bazaar

Shoppers planned their days off around the bazaar, she said, and line-ups began snaking around the building by 6:30 a.m., "and we prayed for good weather. It is sad that it's closing, but I guess, everything has to move on."

It's been 23 years since Roberta Dubiner chaired the event, and as a member of the organization's executive, she was part of the decision to end the bazaar.

"Every year it gets harder and harder to get merchandise, and there is too much competition out there."

As well, Dubiner said, the younger members are busy juggling work and family and don't have the time to devote to planning the event.

"I gave up one year of my life to plan the bazaar, and my husband even bought me a second phone line. It was a full-time job."

She said she is going to miss the family aspect of bazaar. "It was a day for families to be together. Husbands took the day off work, and children took off school. It was a wonderful feeling to walk into the room and see grandmothers, children and grandchildren all working together.

Benjamin Levitt said she has been planning this year's event since the day after last year's bazaar. "I want to go out with a bang."

She agreed that it will be a sad day, "but it is bittersweet. We've had 84 successful years, and we should be proud."

Proceeds from the bazaar have supported a host of projects in Israel, she said, such as hospitals, hotlines and shelters, and locally, it has benefited Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre, which is building a new neo-natal unit.

Presentation of Bazaar clipboard to Doodie Libman, Bazaar chair in 1979 by her daughter, Judy Winberg, who went on to become a "Second Generation" Bazaar chair in 1995.

Open Letter to the Community

In light of the current world financial crisis and uncertainty about the future, it's safe to say that Toronto's Jewish community is second to none.

How else do you explain that our annual campaign is currently $4 million ahead of last year's at this time, closing in on $40 million? What a heart-warming achievement! What an incredible community!

We are deeply moved to report that you, our donors - at every level, across the board – clearly understand how much your gift means. Yet again our community has come together, united in its support for the Jewish cause despite many of you feeling the ill-effects of the current economic climate.

While the full impact of this crisis is still unclear, a number of our UJA–affiliated agencies, which serve our community's most vulnerable citizens including our seniors, young people, the working poor and newcomers to Canada, as well as those in need in Israel, are preparing for the impact of a downturn in our economy. As a community we must be ready to support them as they support others.

It's wonderful for people to be caring and supportive when times are good but you really get a true sense of a community by how it responds in the face of adversity. We recognize many of our contributors face difficult times and difficult choices ahead. However, we couldn't be prouder of how Jewish Toronto has responded so far and we look forward to continuing this inspiring journey with you.

We wish you and your loved ones Chag Sameach and Shana Tova.

Sincerely,

CJC has three priority issues

In statements last week, both Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada congratulated Harper on his victory, but cautioned there was more work to be done on behalf of the Jewish community.

"We look forward to continuing to work closely with [the] prime minister… to ensure that these issues are addressed as a matter of priority by the new government," B'nai Brith said.

Canadian Jewish Congress wished the Harper government "warmest congratulations" and also thanked all candidates for their efforts.

"We also urge a spirit of co-operation among all parties in the new Parliament to best deal with issues of critical significance to Canada and the international community," said congress co-presidents Sylvain Abitbol and Rabbi Reuven Bulka.

Congress CEO Bernie Farber told The CJN that his organization will be pushing three priority issues with the government.

First, it will be "refocusing" on security funding, looking for monetary increases for Jewish establishments "to better protect Jewish citizens from the potential of terrorist attacks," he said, adding that Congress will also continue to work with "all levels of government and all political parties" to ensure there's a "visceral understanding [and] clear vision about who the terrorist groups and organizations are out there" in Canada in a post 9/11 world.

Congress will also make poverty a major item, seeking to "identify pockets of poverty" in Jewish neighbourhoods, as well as in other communities, to try and buffer the effects of a worsening economy on those most vulnerable to it, Farber said.

Josh Cooper, executive director of the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee (CJPAC), said he was proud of the community's participation in the election campaign. CJPAC had been exhorting Jews to "make their presence felt in the election. It engaged 550 volunteers nationwide and worked in conjunction with Elections Canada, CJC, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Canada-Israel Committee to increase Jewish voter turnout.

"My gut feeling is that our community did really well," Cooper said. "But I'd say [Canadian Jews] exceeded all expectations this election as candidates, volunteers and voters."

He said more detailed analysis of Jewish voter turnout should be available early next year.

Rachel Getting Married

Uncertain times ahead for UJA affiliated agencies

By Taali Lester Tollman

With the uncertainty of an economic crisis looming, UJA Federation affiliated agencies are preparing for difficult times ahead. It is unclear how the economic downturn will affect the thousands of men, women and children they serve, but agencies are bracing themselves for what could be a difficult road ahead.

"We foresee a growing cohort that will need help for the first time in their lives," Richard Cummings, Executive Director of Jewish Family and Child (JF&CS) explained. "We will need to respond not only with financial assistance but also with psycho-social services, including counseling, employment and affordable housing."

According to Cummings, major stress over financial issues can relate to significant risks in domestic violence, drug abuse, child endangerment and lack of appropriate housing. It also makes finding employment even more difficult.

"We are anticipating that it will take longer for newcomers to find work in their fields or related fields," said Janice Roth, Executive Director of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services of Toronto (JIAS Toronto). "The ripple effect will be that the funds they come here with will run out before they start earning money, and there will be an increased demand on the community for assistance."

Eric Hirsh, a supervisor with the Supplementary Financial/Assistance Program/ Rehabilitation with Jewish Family & Child believes it is too early to tell what the actual impact will be but he can project for the future.

"Clients will come back to us unemployed after having lost marginal jobs like in retail," Kirsh said. "We will also see an increase in families that have over extended themselves and will need help making mortgage payments or needing rent."

"Financial challenges and poverty are predictors for significant problems that will bring clients to our door," Cummings continued. "More than ever, we need our community to step up, more than ever we need everyone's support."

Many Jewish Torontonians supported by UJA affiliated agencies, are facing difficult times.

UJA Campaign 2009 approaching $40 million

Campaign $4 million ahead of last year's pace

By Howard English

Forty and four. Two numbers that sum up the remarkably good news so far about this year's United Jewish Appeal campaign.

In the face of worldwide financial uncertainty and widespread economic concerns, the UJA campaign total of close to $40 million to date is four million dollars ahead of last year, with more than 12,000 contributing donors.

Campaign 2009 chairs Fran Sonshine and Henry Wolfond report that gifts are coming in strongly at every level and several thousand donors have made campaign commitments since the full force of the economic crisis struck.

What's more, neither Wolfond nor Sonshine are surprised at this generous turn of events.

"We recognize many of our contributors face difficult times and difficult choices ahead," said Sonshine. "However, they also understand how much their gift means to those who need our help during the most serious global financial challenge in many decades."

"It's wonderful for people to be caring and supportive when times are good but you really get a true sense of how great a community is when it responds this way in the face of adversity," noted Wolfond. "Our community is coming together, united in its support for social justice even though many are feeling the ill-effects of the current economic climate."

Despite an uncertain economy, United Jewish Appeal's Campaign 2009 is currently $4 million ahead of last year's campaign.

"I canvassed a young man who increased his gift from $100 to $500 even though it hasn't been a great year for him," said Doris Starr, a UJA telethon volunteer. "He told me that although it is challenging for him to give larger gifts every year, it is clearly necessary because it's even more challenging for those who depend on our help."

"I was worried about canvassing for UJA this year," said volunteer Allan Jeffries. "I usually get great personal satisfaction and fulfillment from it, but with the economy as shaky as it is right now, I was scared that I'd have no success with donors. Turns out I was wrong – this Jewish community is amazing. People pull together and give 'till it hurts – even when times are more than a bit tough."

While the full impact of current economic events is still unclear, a number of UJA affiliated agencies serving the vulnerable both here and in Israel, including seniors, youth at risk, the working poor and new immigrants, are preparing for an economic downturn.

UJA will soon be discussing the current situation with its agencies, but president and CEO Ted Sokolsky is confident about being able to meet community needs.

"As long as our community's globally recognized generosity continues at its present pace, we'll be able to care for those who so strongly rely on us," he said. "As a community we must be ready to support them and we have no doubt that community members who have yet to make a campaign pledge will do so as soon as possible, precisely because of the challenges ahead."

The bottom line is more than money. It's community compassion, strength and unity when confronted by troubling events – qualities that Wolfond and Sonshine see in extraordinary measure.

"This is an amazing community," concludes Sonshine, "we should all be proud to live here."

Despite economic woes New York UJA raises $43 million in one night

By Daniel Horowitz

Late last month, as the U.S. House of Representatives passed the revised version of a $700 billion bank bailout plan intended to bolster the flailing U.S. financial system, supporters of UJA Federation New York came together to execute their own plan.

Major Federation donors assembled at the home of Alan "Ace" and Kathryn Greenberg to launch New York's 2009 Annual Campaign, as they have for the past 22 years. Guest-speaker, Governor David Paterson, surveyed the challenges facing New Yorkers and was eloquent in extolling the leadership role of UJA Federation.

Once again, leading members of New York's financial industry – including many who have been impacted by the tumultuous economic events that continue to unfold – came together on that night to raise an incredible $43 million towards the campaign, surpassing last year's total by $2 million.

"In one evening, 110 people came together and proclaimed, that despite this economic environment, we are among the most privileged men and women on the planet, and we are certainly the most privileged generation of Jews," said John Ruskay, President and CEO, UJA Federation, New York. "The recognition of blessings filled the room, together with appreciation of the indispensable role of UJA Federation and its network of agencies, particularly during these times."

Shmittah dispute had unintended effects

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

This Rosh Hashanah marked the end of the shmittah, the sabbatical year, during which agricultural activity in the Land of Israel pauses. As Shabbat is to the work week, shmittah is to the agricultural cycle.

For different reasons, in 1889, rabbis in eastern Europe made an allowance permitting work in the field during the sabbatical year. They devised a plan, known as the heter mechirah, wherein by selling the entire Land of Israel to a non-Jew (sounds like Pesach and selling the chametz!), agricultural work could continue.

Clearly, not everyone agreed to this. In fact, it has been a serious point of contention every seven years in the 120 years since it was enacted.

With the establishment of the State of Israel, it became the task of the Chief Rabbinate to oversee this "sale" – that is, until this past year, when extreme pressure was put on the chief rabbis by the Lithuanian haredi sector not to oversee it.

Upon hearing this, Rabbi Ovadia Yosef, a former chief Sephardi rabbi, summoned his son on the eve of last Rosh Hashanah to his home and instructed him to perform the "sale" nonetheless. It's not that Rabbi Yosef was personally practising or advocating this leniency. Rather, since realistically the majority of Israeli farmers would not be adhering to the sabbatical restriction, he felt that this would effectively save them from this transgression.

This serves as a background for the outcome of the recent vote for Israel's new rabbinical council. This is the group that determines who is ordained as a rabbi, who is a Jew, what is kosher and what is not, and sets the general course of religion in Israel. Chief rabbis are voted in for five-year terms. As in all politics, the reality is that there is a good measure of backroom dealing and horse-trading involved (yes, even in rabbinic appointments).

Historically, Shas, the Sephardi party, has always aligned itself with the Lithuanian haredi party in one voting bloc, effectively giving them total control over the result of the elections.

Apparently, this act of "sale" last year by Rabbi Avraham Yosef was seen by the Lithuanian rabbis as so unacceptable that they found him totally unfit for the position of chief rabbi of Ashdod, so they opposed his candidacy.

Rabbi Ovadia Yosef, father of Avraham, had been grooming his son for this position and hence could not then align himself with the Lithuanian haredi party.

For the first time, the factions of the traditional Sephardi and Ashkenazi coalition went their separate ways. This resulted in big winners and, conversely, big losers. No one, however, could predict, nor was quite ready for, the actual outcome. Every single candidate from the Lithuanian haredi ballot found themselves out, including long-term incumbents, while the Sephardi ballot in its entirety was elected.

Rabbi Tzvi Yehuda Kook, when asked about the reliability of the "sale," responded, "What is important here is that no lashon hara (gossip) go on. Shmittah is today a rabbinic enactment. Lashon hara remains of biblical responsibility."

The birth of modern Hebrew

Class Act
By Daniel Held

This year we celebrate the 150th anniversary of Eliezer Ben Yehudah's birth. While the streets named after Ben Yehudah in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv may be familiar, I find that the story of their namesake is often forgotten.

Ben Yehudah was the father of modern Hebrew. Author of the first dictionary, builder of a new lexicon, Ben Yehudah insisted that the establishment of the new state be centred around a common language. He spent his days creating new Hebrew words, often basing their design on extensions of biblical Hebrew.

Ben Yehudah insisted that his son, Ben Zion, be educated exclusively in Hebrew. The child grew up in a linguistic island in the middle of Jerusalem. All around him German, Yiddish, English and other languages were spoken. Ben Yehudah, however, controlled his son's environment to ensure that he only acquire Hebrew. His neighbours thought him crazy – depriving his son of the ability to communicate with others. Ben Zion, however, proved to be the first native speaker of modern Hebrew.

The fruit of Ben Yehudah's linguistic campaign are seen around the world today. Hebrew is spoken by nearly seven million people worldwide. Its canon of poetry, prose and plays has received international awards, and literature published in Hebrew is readily available in translation into scores of language.

For me, Hebrew serves as my connector to Jews around the world. I have used it when meeting new friends in Argentina, while teaching in Ukraine, and in a shul in Germany. It has been the bridge linking me to Jews in distant places speaking disparate languages. When I was young, I used to think of Hebrew as a secret code. On one occasion my sister and I used it in a market in South Africa to determine our bargaining strategy without the storekeeper knowing.

Hebrew has also served as a symbol of resistance.The use and teaching of Hebrew was banned in Soviet Russia because it was viewed as a symbol of Zionism and Judaism. Teachers and students would secretly gather together to share scarce, illegal collections of Hebrew publications and to prepare themselves for immigration to Israel.

A few years ago, I went to visit Ben Yehudah's house in Jerusalem. The small, humble, brick home sits on a quiet alleyway not far from the centre of town. From the outside, the building is quite unremarkable, and in looking for the correct address I walked past the house several times. When I did finally arrive, I asked the tour guide why it isn't better marked. Surely the building, which produced the first Hebrew dictionary and the first native Hebrew speaker, should at least have a plaque?

The guide took me out to the gate. There he showed me a discoloured patch on the wall. Time after time, a plaque had been posted describing the house, Ben Yehudah and the revival of the Hebrew language. Each plaque, however, had been torn down. Today, Ben Yehudah's house is close not only to town but also to a haredi neighbourhood. Some of these neighbours view the use of modern Hebrew as blasphemous. To them, Hebrew is the language of prayer and Torah, and its use in everyday parlance denigrates the holiness of the language.

The debate over the use of Hebrew language is not restricted to the religious forum. Purists believe that the language is being corrupted by the introduction of Hebraicized English words; Yiddishists promote the use of Yiddish as a common Jewish language; and the rapid growth of TV and the Internet in youth culture has put English at the forefront of Israeli culture and news.

Notwithstanding these challenges, Hebrew continues to grow. If only Ben Yehudah could walk down a street in Jerusalem today. While he may not recognize some of the words he helped to create, he should feel confident that he brought back to life an aging language.

Indignation by Philip Roth, Viking Publishers.

Roth's protagonist has an irrational father

Books
Bernard Baskin

The protagonist and narrator of Indignation, Roth's new, brief novel – his 29th – is Marcus Messner, a Jewish college sophomore from Newark, N.J., who describes himself as follows: "In my high school years I had been a prudent, responsible, diligent, hardworking. A student who went out with only the nicest girls, a dedicated debater and a utility infielder for the varsity baseball team." Marcus neither smokes nor drinks, is sexually inexperienced and spends long hours at work in his father's kosher butcher store.

The novel is set in 1951 during the Korean War and young Marcus is eager to continue his education – among other reasons – to escape the draft that might have him ending up in Korea fighting.

However, he is confronted with the problem of an increasingly irrational father who is obsessed with his son's security and well-being.

So Marcus, desperately eager to escape his father's stifling influence, secretly transfers to Winesburg, a small Lutheran college 500 miles away in the farm country of north-central Ohio.

And so begins a series of unlikely events that lead "the nicest boy in the world" to his untimely and unnecessary death.

At Winesburg, studious and serious Marcus doesn't get on with his loud, loutish and beer-swilling classmates. He is soon attracted to beautiful Olivia, an alluring campus beauty, but on their first date he is both repelled and attracted by her sexual aggressiveness.

Winesburg's dean, attempting clumsily to integrate Marcus into the college's way of life, ends up facing an angry 19-year-old who proclaims his individuality, his atheism, his refusal to attend mandatory chapel and his disdain for Winesburg's cherished traditions. The heated exchanges between outraged Marcus and the sanctimonious dean are brilliant, often verging on bitter humour.

Marcus' mother comes to visit and confides that she is considering a divorce from her "impossible" husband. Her son is dumbfounded. "Divorce was unknown in our Jewish neighbourhood. I was led to believe it was all but unknown in the Jewish world. Divorce was scandalous. Divorce was shameful… growing up I had never known of a single household among my friends or my schoolmates or my family's friends where the parents were divorced, or were drunks, or for that matter, owned a dog. I was raised to think all three repugnant. My mother could have stunned me more only if she had gone out and bought a Great Dane."

Finally, mother and son reach an agreement; she will not seek a divorce if he will give up Olivia, now known to be an alcoholic, sexually promiscuous and a victim of depression who had attempted suicide.

She pleads with her son, saying: "The world is full of young woman who have not slit any wrists – who have slit nothing. They exist by the millions, find one of them… to want to wipe out everything before your life has even begun – absolutely not. You have no business with such a person, you don't need such a person, no matter what kind of goddess she looks like and how many beautiful flowers she brings you."

Dubious, but still rebellious, Marcus is instructed by a fellow student how to deviously avoid chapel. He is caught and expelled from Winesburg. His death already indicated halfway though the novel ends a tragic story in the bloody hills of Korea, a victim of self-destructive fury and the entangling absurdities of a jejune society.

Roth's prose is brilliantly engaging, the narrative engrossing and the limning of characters masterful. Indignation is intended to teach us something at this juncture in history – just what this lesson is, is subject to a variety of interpretations.

Parshat Hashavuah

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

A bead of perspiration trickles down your neck. For the first time since you were a child, you have been called upon to say a few words about this week's Torah's portion at your synagogue's study group. But instead of panicking, you realize that the collected wisdom of countless rabbis and other commentators are available at your fingertips. If only you knew where to look.

There are two different ways to join in the online learning of parshat hashavuah, the weekly reading from the Torah. You can either visit a website on a regular basis, such as the ones mentioned here, to check out that week's material and archived resources from previous years. Or you can join a list. Once you sign up, that week's commentary will be automatically e-mailed to you. Some lists are one way only – you receive a weekly mailing. Others allow you to respond and offer your own insights.

Commentaries are available from almost every perspective imaginable. From Rabbi Shlomo Riskin's weekly Shabbat Shalom [tinyurl.com/torah01] to Torah Hayim – Living Torah Study for Reform Jews [uahc.org/torah] to the Jewish Theological Seminary of America. [tinyurl.com/torah02]

You can also study the Women's View on the Parshah [tinyurl.com/torah03] or the parshah from a Reconstructionist perspective. [tinyurl.com/torah04] And if you'd like to study while on the go, download the Tanach Study Center's weekly commentary onto your Palm. [tanach.org]

If you are looking for a one-stop shop, visit Rabbi Joshua Cypess' Electronic Torah Warehouse. This massive undertaking links to hundreds of Jewish sites, including dozens of weekly Torah sites. [eparsha. com] For more lists, check out Eric Simon's Torahnet Page [torahnet.org] and Shamash The Jewish Network. [tinyurl.com/torah05] And although Wikipedia is not always accurate, the site does provide an interesting overview of how the Torah was divided into weekly portions, as well as pages for each parshah. [tinyurl. com/ torah14]

For many years, the late Prof. Nehama Leibowitz would distribute weekly pamphlets or gilyonot with Torah insights to her students. You can read them in English or in Hebrew. [tinyurl.com/torah06] For more commentaries in Hebrew, check out Bar Ilan University [tinyurl.com/torah07] and a site called Kipa. [tinyurl.com/torah08]

If you prefer to listen to a lecture rather than read one, try out "613.org: The First World-Wide Jewish Audio Since Mount Sinai." [613.org/ parasha. html] According to the site, there are more than 250 classes by speakers from all over the world. At ThinkJewish International you can listen to chassidic insights from Chabad.org [tinyurl.com/torah09] and thoughts from the Darchei Noam Institutions. [tinyurl.com/torah11] And if you'd like to watch a discussion the weekly portion, you can look in on Rabbi Igal Haimoff's class. [tinyurl.com/torah13]

Some parshat hashavuah sites have kids in mind. In Kinder Torah, Simcha Groffman looks at the weekly Torah portion and suggests to parents some lessons that they may want to pass on to their children. [tinyurl.com/torah10] For example, Parshat Bereshit tells how the world was created after God spoke of His intention to do so. Kinder Torah explains how our use of words is also important in that if we speak kindly, we can create a world of good.

For something different, go to Torah Tidbits [ou.org/torah/tt/] and click on Parshah Pix & Stats. Every week, you'll get a screen full of pictures that relate in some way to the Torah portion. Torah Tots' Parshah on Parade has kid-friendly explanations and related colouring pages that can be printed out and decorated. [torahtots.com/parsha. htm] And if you love Torah and statistics, then check out Torah Tidbits. Did you know that Parshat Bereshit has 146 verses? It ranks eighth in the Torah – the same as Miketz, but Miketz is longer in lines, words and letters. [tinyurl.com/torah12]

So learn, discuss and enjoy. But please remember that what you print will often include God's name. Respect the sanctity of the material.

What's Syria up to in Lebanon?

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The big news from the Middle East last week did not involve Israel – at least not directly. On Oct. 14, Syrian President Bashar Assad announced that his country would establish diplomatic relations with Lebanon.

CTV.ca carried an Associated Press story titled "Syria establishes diplomatic ties with Lebanon" (Oct. 14) that explained: "The two countries have not had formal diplomatic relations since they gained independence from France in the 1940s.

"Lebanon and Syria agreed earlier this year to establish diplomatic ties and demarcate their contentious border. The west and Lebanese anti-Syrian politicians have long demanded Syria recognize Lebanon's sovereignty by establishing official relations."

AP reported on the background to Syria's involvement in Lebanon: "Relations between the two Arab nations have been lopsided in Syria's favour since the 1970s, when Syria sent its army into Lebanon and retained control there for nearly 30 years. Ties unravelled when former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri was killed in a 2005 car bombing that many Lebanese blame on Syria – a charge Syria denies.

"After Hariri's assassination, Syria caved to U.S.-led international pressure and withdrew its troops from Lebanon."

As AP explained: "Establishing diplomatic relations remained a pressing demand by the anti-Syrian majority in Lebanon's parliament, which contended that the lack of official ties reflects Syria's refusal to recognize Lebanese sovereignty."

Syria has recently held four rounds of indirect peace talks with Israel using Turkey as a mediator. But last month, it raised concerns in Jerusalem (and Beirut) when it sent 10,000 troops to its border with Lebanon, ostensibly to stop cross-border smuggling after bombings in Tripoli and Damascus.

So the announcement that Syria will open an embassy in Beirut has, at least for now, allayed some concerns about Syria's military designs on its neighbour. But the true meaning behind Syria's diplomatic move is open to interpretation.

In "An iron fist in a velvet glove" (Jerusalem Post, Oct. 15), Jonathan Spyer explained that two key factors opened the door to Assad's recognition of Lebanese independence. First, the Doha Agreement of May 21 gave Hezbollah, Syria's "chief ally," veto power in the Lebanese cabinet, and thus the "the power to stop any decision by Beirut not to [Damascus'] liking."

Second, following his warm reception in Paris from French President Nicolas Sarkozy in July and the prospect of trade deals with the European Union, Assad calculated that diplomatic recognition of Lebanon, something urged by Sarkozy, could help end his international isolation.

Still, Spyer argued, Hezbollah's role remains key. As Spyer put it: "The independent military capacity wielded by [Hezbollah] – pointed at Israel and, where necessary, at pro-western forces in Lebanon – continues to be supplied via Damascus. This capacity holds the final word in Lebanon. Nothing can happen without its consent."

"Just married and determined to die," a chilling story by BBC News reporter Paul Wood, ran on Newsworld Oct. 13. Wood profiled a young, newly married Gaza woman who is being trained by Islamic Jihad as a suicide bomber.

Wood reported: "When she spoke of becoming a suicide bomber, Umm Anas' voice was strong and steady: 'This is a gift from God. We were created to become martyrs for God,' she continued, her eyes burning behind the full face veil."

"'All the Palestinian people were created to fight in God's name. If we just throw stones at the Jews, they get scared. Imagine what happens when body parts fly at them.'"

"Her main motivation in becoming a suicide bomber appears to be religious rather than nationalistic – the fulfilment of a long-held ambition. Even getting married recently hadn't changed her mind."

"But wouldn't she have any difficulty killing people not holding a gun? Wouldn't she feel pity for women and children?

"'It is not important because all of them have violated our land. Children are civilians, but they grow up to become soldiers… They are all brought up to hate us. Palestine is only for Palestinians. We must kick them all out in any way we can.'"

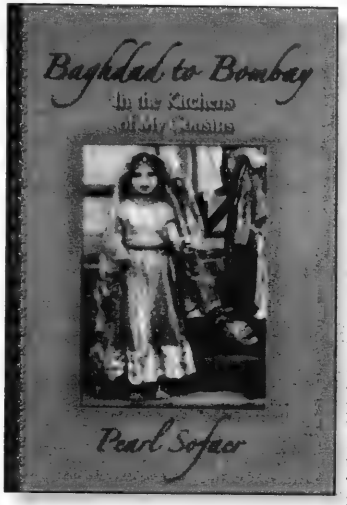
From Baghdad to Bombay – a tapestry of recipes and reminiscences

By NORENE GILLETZ

Recently, I met Flo Urbach at a friend's simchah, and as we sat around the table, the conversation turned to food, as it often does. Urbach, who was born in Baghdad and now lives in Toronto, told me that her cousin, Pearl Sofaer, had recently written a cookbook titled Baghdad to Bombay: In the Kitchens of my Cousins.

This book is more than a cookbook – it's a memoir that is rich with recipes and tales from exotic places, perfect for anyone with a love of family and food. It was inspired by family kitchens in Baghdad, Burma, India, Australia, Israel, London, New York and San Francisco. Baghdad to Bombay offers 50 mouth-watering recipes, family photographs and reminiscences, weaving the threads of a family into a rich tapestry of good food.

As an Iraqi Jew who grew up in India and now lives in California, Pearl Sofaer has a unique perspective on food and its cultural significance. She was born in Bombay, but her family originated in Baghdad and Kirkuk, Iraq, before migrating to Burma and India at the beginning of the 20th century. After the partition of India in 1947, most of her family moved to different parts of the world. Surrounded by Jewish, Middle Eastern and Indian Cuisines, Sofaer became inspired by the vast repertoire of recipes in her kitchen and decided to share this wealth of cultural background with readers.



"My father suggested that our rich heritage had been placed in my hands and we had to do something with this gift," Sofaer says. "Everything becomes part of a rich tradition of sharing food and stories."

She travelled four continents to speak with as many of her first and second cousins as possible. "Thanks to their openness, I can now share their passion and stories handed down to us by our forefathers from Babylon, Baghdad and Bombay. I invite you to come into the kitchens of my cousins to share their favourite meals and enjoy a vital tapestry of our history and personal reminiscences."

Pearl Sofaer will be speaking at the Jewish Book Fair on Nov. 4 at 1:30 p.m. and her book will be available. For more information about Sofaer, visit www.pearlsofaer.com or contact Flo Urbach at 416-449-4966.

Here are some recipes suggested by Urbach that are typical Baghdadi dishes.

Baghdadi chicken soup – good for what ails you

PEARL'S MARAG

Baghdadi Jewish chicken soup – a cure-all.

1 small chicken, cut up and skinned
1 tsp. turmeric
1/2 tsp. each garlic powder and ginger powder
salt and pepper to taste
2 medium skinned tomatoes parboiled, peeled and mashed water to cover chicken plus 2 more cups
6 peeled and cut-up carrots

Pearl Sofaer

In a large pot, brown chicken quickly on medium heat for 15-20 minutes. Add all spices to chicken, add mashed tomatoes and keep stirring. Cook on low for 20 minutes.

Add water to cover chicken plus 2 more cups. Cook, covered, on low to medium for 40 minutes. Add carrots or any other preferred vegetables. Continue to cook for another 30 minutes. Serve with boiled basmati rice. Makes 3 to 4 servings.

HAMEEM

Also known in Arabic as t'bith, this is usually served with zalatha (tomato garnish) and halbah (a relish). In Bombay, hameem was eaten on Saturday for lunch after we returned from the synagogue.

1 whole roasting chicken
1 tsp. ground turmeric
1 tsp. ground cardamom
4 medium tomatoes, parboiled, peeled and mashed 1 cup rice (or more if you wish)
salt and pepper to taste
1 large carrot peeled and cut into 1-inch pieces and parboiled in 2 cups of water (save the water)

Preheat the oven to 350 to 375. Rub the chicken well with turmeric and ground cardamom; brown in a large pot over medium heat without oil. Move the chicken to a plate after browning.

Add mashed tomatoes to drippings and stir quickly. Add rice to the tomatoes, stir quickly, and move rice to the side of the pot. Return chicken to the pot. Sprinkle salt and pepper on the chicken. Stir all together quickly. Gradually add carrot and cooking water to the pot. Add more water depending on amount of rice used (2 cups of water to 1 cup rice).

Cover and cook for 1/2 hour on low to medium heat. Once rice has absorbed all the liquid, place covered pot in the pre-heated oven for 1 hour.

Reduce oven to 250 and cook for 4 more hours. Chicken can cook from morning to evening at a lower heat if you will be out all day. Dinner will be ready when you return.

Zalatha:

Dice 6 to 8 medium tomatoes; add juice of 1/2 lemon and freshly chopped parsley or cilantro. Enjoy as a garnish on pita bread.

Molly's Halbah:

1 large tbsp. fenugreek, ground and soaked in boiled water for 4 hours
1 bunch fresh coriander, stems removed
1 cup fresh parsley
2 cloves garlic
1 or 2 green chilies to taste juice of 1/2 lemon
salt to taste

Mix all ingredients in a blender to form a thick sauce. Add salt while blending; adjust lemon juice and garlic to your taste.

Weizmann, U of T to honour professor

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Weizmann Science Canada and University of Toronto have partnered to raise funds and draw attention to both their MD/PhD programs and to pay tribute to Dr. Arnold Aberman for his many contributions to academic medicine.

On Nov 3, a gala dinner will be held at the Sheraton Centre Hotel in Toronto in hopes of raising $3 million for scholarship support of the MD/PhD programs at the Weizmann Institute of Science in Rehovot, Israel, and at U of T.

U of T has had the program in place since 1984, but Weizmann, regarded as one of the best bioscience graduate schools, is introducing its "PhD for MDs" program to coincide with Weizmann's Feinberg Graduate School's 50th anniversary this year.

The programs are designed to provide physicians with the opportunity to obtain PhD degrees and scientists with the opportunity to obtain MD degrees to help bridge the gap between clinical practice and research.

"It's important on one hand to have physicians who are thoroughly schooled in modern bioscience and it is important to have biomedical scientists who understand medicine," said Aberman, a Montreal native, who is a professor at U of T and helps to promote the MD/PhD programs in Canada and Israel.

Throughout Aberman's career that has spanned across four decades, he has served as physician-in-chief of Mount Sinai Hospital, physician-in-chief of Toronto General Hospital, U of T's chair of the department of medicine, and U of T's dean of the faculty of medicine.

Aberman said that when he was approached by Weizmann representatives last year about organizing a fundraising effort for its MD/PhD program in his honour, he suggested that they team up with U of T.

"I thought it would be good if the Weizmann, a premier, first class, Israeli academic institution with strong graduate programs would partner with the University of Toronto, a first class Canadian institution with outstanding graduate programs. I thought it would be a good partnership and that many people in Toronto would want to participate in such a joint venture," he said.

According to an information brochure provided by U of T and Weizmann, the participants work with senior scientists on important research questions and often make significant scientific discoveries. The degrees are obtained in an average of seven years.

"The goal of this combined degree program is to train the most talented students available for careers as physician scientists," founding director of U of T's MD/PhD program Mel Silverman wrote. "Nearly 25 years later, with an enrolment of 39 students and 32 graduates, our program remains pre-eminent in Canada and our graduates are assuming leadership positions nationally and internationally in both academic medicine and in various health research capacities."

Aberman, who actively promotes the importance of providing funding to cover the cost of tuition and compensation for the participants' loss of income, said he was flattered that the school wanted to honour him for his many achievements and is looking forward to the event.

He said the evening will consist of a video screening, and Aberman himself will address the guests.

He said the guests will "have to wait and see" what he'll be speaking about but hinted that he will present information about the concept and goal of the MD/PhD program and about both academic institutions.

"I'm happy that today, with the discussion of some people advocating boycotts of Israeli institutions, I'm happy that U of T is openly partnering with Israeli institutions."

For more information, call U of T at 416-978-7142 or Weizmann Science Canada at 416-733-9220.

Holy Days clearly results in differential treatment on the basis of creed, in that individuals of one group, those of Jewish faith, are given preferential treatment over other."

York spokesperson Alex Bilyk said Jewish students aren't required to go to Noble's lectures on the High Holidays, adding that he has a right to teach his classes if he wants to.

"Prof. Noble is holding an additional class, and that's his prerogative," Bilyk said. "He's informed whoever needs to be informed, and the steps have been made to make sure there's a classroom available for him."

Noble held a three-hour seminar on the second day of Rosh Hashanah, when classes were cancelled. Roughly 15 of his 30 students attended, including at least one Jewish student, but the seminar could not take place in its regular classroom, because it was locked, the Toronto Star reported. York implemented the mandatory closure policy in 1974 to accommodate its large Jewish population of students and faculty who would have to miss classes to observe the High Holidays.

An estimated six per cent of York's 51,000 students are Jewish, while about five per cent are Muslim and more than 60 per cent are Christian, a recent school report found.

Na'amat shelter treats the whole woman

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Israeli representatives led a workshop at the first World Conference of Women's Shelters, held last month in Edmonton.

Ruth Ozery, director of the Na'amat Canada Shelter for the Prevention of Violence in the Family in Tel Aviv, and Hadara Matar, an attorney and legal adviser in Na'amat's department for the prevention of violence in the family in Israel, spoke to shelter workers from 51 countries around the world.

Hadara Matar

Ruth Ozery

Matar, among other positions, is a member of the Israeli parliamentary committee on violence against women, a member of the Tel Aviv municipal council for the prevention of violence and a lecturer to social workers in the field of violence against women.

Speaking at a Na'amat breakfast meeting, she said they asked to present a workshop at the conference, organized by the Alberta Council of Women's Shelters, "because we wanted to put Israel on the map on this subject."

Their shelter, with capacity for 30 women and children, is open to any woman in Israel, although many are immigrants from Russia, Ethiopia or the Far East.

"We know that the same problem is everywhere. Immigrants don't have the language and they don't have money, and these stresses increase violence. It's a global problem," Matar said.

Ozery, a member of the Israeli Shelter Directors Forum and the Tel Aviv Municipal Council for the Prevention of Violence, said their shelter is unique because Matar, a lawyer, has an office there.

"We find it important for women to see a lawyer right from the start – she was the only lawyer at the conference – because they can receive help not only with their divorce, but with problems regarding rent, employment or other issues," Ozery said.

"When [representatives] from other countries heard about this, they were amazed, but for us, it is obvious. If some of her problems get sorted out from the start, she is free to work with the social worker about other things."

Each woman has a family lawyer from legal aid, Ozery said, "but she has a lot of other problems that she needs to deal with. Violence is only one of the problems. We try to help her with everything, and our services are available even after she leaves the shelter."

Matar said the shelter worked with a Palestinian woman who came to them with a nine-month-old child, and received services for 12 years.

"The Palestinians wanted to kill her because she left her home, and she came with no papers. She stayed with us for four years – she lived close to the shelter after that – because we had no place to send her. We could not find a solution in Israel, so we worked on moving her out of Israel."

Matar said they worked with the Red Cross and various embassies to find a solution, and then the woman married an American Christian man. "He wanted to take her to the United States, so we went to the court in Ramallah to make arrangements for the child to leave the country. When the woman left, she gave money to the shelter.

"This is a unique story, but it shows that we try to help, even if it looks like there is no solution," Matar said.

Ozery said they approach the situation holistically. "It's not a stopgap measure. We treat the whole woman, and everything that has contributed to the situation."

When women come to them, she said, "we make sure they don't feel ashamed, and we teach the children why they are there.

"It is a community problem, and the community needs to take care of them, so we have volunteers that work with them. We cannot touch their painful places right away, such as their self-esteem or their suffering, but we can soften things and allow them to experience things they never thought they could experience."

Little things add up, she said. "A woman may put on makeup for the first time because her husband never allowed it. She never dreamed of doing this, and then [maybe she can do something else and something else.] Finally, enough doors open that she can deal with things that touch her heart."

Every woman is at different risk, Matar said, and they assess every situation and do not allow the woman out if they think she may be in danger. "We measure the risk every time."

They also deal with men who come for help, she said. "We have male social workers who help abusive men. They teach them to use language instead of violence to express themselves.

"Abuse does not have to be physical, and sometimes it is hard to recognize. It can be very subtle. Some men can be very charming and impressive. It is hard to notice that something is wrong."

Ownership of Stern painting is appealed

MONTREAL — A Rhode Island federal court will decide whether a painting claimed by the estate of the late German-born Montreal art dealer Max Stern returns to this city.

The First U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals on Oct. 8 heard the appeal of Maria-Louise Bissonnette, an 84-year-old German baroness living in Providence, to overturn the decision that awarded the painting to the Stern estate. Last December, U.S. District Court Judge Mary Lisi ruled that the estate was the rightful owner, and ordered Bissonnette to hand over the painting to the estate.

The estate successfully argued that the 19th-century painting by Franz Xavier Winterhalter had effectively been looted by the Nazi government in 1937, when Stern, then a Dusseldorf art gallery owner, was ordered to liquidate his remaining holdings at a state-sanctioned auction because Jews were banned from the art trade under the Nuremberg Laws.

The estate's lawyer, Thomas Kline, told the court that Stern gallery inventory was sold for well below its market value and that Stern, who fled to France a month after the 1937 auction, lost most of the proceeds because it was taxed away by Nazi officials when he and his mother left Germany.

The current value of the oil painting has been appraised at $67,000 to $94,000 (US).

Stern, who died childless in 1987, left his estate to the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, McGill University and Concordia University, which is heading the international quest for the restitution of the more than 200 of Stern's works that went on the block in Cologne in November 1937, as well as possibly an equal number that he was forced to sell off elsewhere from 1935 on.

Bissonnette's stepfather, a Nazi party member, bought the painting ,titled Girl from the Sabiner Mountains, at the Cologne auction. She has said that her stepfather, Dr. Karl Wilharm, paid $3,600 for it and that she has the papers to prove it. She eventually inherited it from her mother's estate.

Kline counters that because the painting was stolen that sale is invalid.

Bissonnette's lawyer, David Levy, argued in the appeals court that the Stern estate waited too long to pursue a claim on the painting. He also noted that the painting in question was not among the works Stern himself listed in advertising he placed in art publications after World War II in attempting to recover his collection.

The estate, Kline said, could not have made a claim on the painting any earlier because it had been kept in Bissonnette's and her family's homes all these years, except for a brief exhibition in Germany in the early 1950s.

The estate learned of the painting's whereabouts in January 2005, when Bissonnette put it up for sale through a Rhode Island auction house. After efforts to reach an out-of-court settlement failed, the estate launched legal proceedings in 2006.

Just before that lawsuit was filed, Bissonnette clandestinely shipped the painting to Germany, where it remains in a warehouse.

The three-judge appeals court did not indicate when it will make a decision.

Famed bodybuilder dies

Weider's evidence was so compelling, King noted, that it was eventually accepted as true by the French government, although there is still no absolute consensus among researchers and scholars about the cause of Napoleon's death.

Weider, as president of the International Napoleon Society, also wrote a well-received paper on Napoleon and the Jews, in which Weider described how Napoleoh's Civil Code helped protect Jewish rights and how Napoleon himself held a very sympathetic view of Jews.

In 2000, Weider, who during his lifetime received dozens of honours and titles from around the world – including a 1984 nomination for the Nobel Peace Prize and the Order of Canada in 1975 – accepted France's highest honour, the Legion of Honour, in Montreal for his scholarly investigations.

For most people, however, the Weider name was inextricably linked to bodybuilding, a multibillion-dollar business he oversaw for some 60 years from a humble industrial building on Bates Road in the Cote des Neiges area, while his older brother, Joe, oversaw the magazine end of the business in California.

Even though Weider's panelled office was adorned with Napoleonic and other arcane historical accoutrements, it was from there that Weider lobbied hard for the respectability he believed bodybuilding deserved, including for it to be accepted as a sport by International Olympic Committee. Up until the day of his death, however, the IOC had yet to do so (although as of August 2000, the International Federation of BodyBuilders (IFBB) has been a permanent member of the IOC).

Still, Weider, as president until retirement in 2006 of the IFBB – which he and his brother founded in 1946 – travelled far and wide in pursuit of making bodybuilding popular around the world.

In 1968, it was the Weiders, anticipating the fitness revolution to come, who first brought then-unknown Austrian bodybuilder Arnold Schwarzenegger to California. Schwarzenegger, a former movie superstar and current governor of California, remained friends with the siblings to the present day.

"Without them having done that [brought me over]," he told the Associated Press upon learning of Weider's death, "I mean, I wouldn't have known how to come over here. I sure didn't have the money. So that was a very important kind of steppingstone for me.

It was Ben Weider's running of the IFBB, Schwarzenegger said, that made it so popular in almost every country around the world.

Over the years, Weider's photograph was taken with leaders of virtually all of the 173 countries affiliated with the IFBB, including the late Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat and several leaders of Israel, where Weider established a gym in Tel Aviv. Weider, although Jewish, was welcomed with his bodybuilding message in most Arab countries, which organized their own bodybuilding organizations in affiliation with the IFBB.

In interviews with The CJN over the years, Weider said he considered himself someone who could bring nations together through his fitness movement. In apartheid South Africa in 1975, at an IFBB-sanctioned event in Pretoria, he insisted on shared accommodation for the competitors.

As detailed in Joe and Ben Weider's 2006 autobiography, Brothers of Iron, written with Mike Steere, however, few, including the Weiders themselves, ever would have predicted the business empire that they did.

Ben was born in 1923, a year or two after Joe, to immigrant parents Louis and Anna.

Dirt poor, the family lived on Colonial Avenue in Montreal, and it was Joe, almost six feet tall and a miserly 113 pounds, who first took up lifting barbells in response to anti-Semitic taunts in the neighbourhood. Ben, as he described himself, was the more "fun-loving" of the brothers, but like his brother, he dropped out of school during the Depression in order to work.

Ben served in the army during World War II, and upon his return, unable to find positions because of perceived anti-Semitism, organized Montreal's first bodybuilding contest at the Monument National Theatre on St. Lawrence Boulevard, "The Main," while putting together a fitness magazine with his brother, who later moved to New Jersey and finally to California.

Although he became bodybuilding's worldwide ambassador, Weider also made significant philanthropic contributions within the Montreal and Jewish community, including for the construction of the YM-YWHA Ben Weider JCC and institutions within the Lubavitch community.

Weider, who was buried on Monday, is survived by his wife of 49 years, Huguette Derouin, sons Louis, Eric and Mark, and siblings Joe and Freda.

Crown argues for jail time for Montreal firebomber

MONTREAL — Azim Ibragimov, who pleaded guilty to firebombing two Jewish community institutions in 2006 and 2007, should receive a four-year prison term, the Crown contends.

Ibragimov's targeting of an Outremont chassidic school and the Snowdon YM-YWHA were not simply vandalism, but hate crimes intended to "terrorize" the Jewish community, and his punishment should send a message that these type of crimes are not tolerated," prosecutor Mario Dufresne said at Ibragimov's sentencing hearing last week.

"The goal was not to just damage property but to cause fear and intimidate… the Jewish community," Dufresne said.

Ibragimov, 24, pleaded guilty to charges related to throwing a Molotov cocktail at the Skver Toldos Yakov Yosef School in September 2006 and of setting off a small explosive device outside the Y in April 2007, as well as setting fire to a parked car in the east end, apparently not connected to the Jewish community, and with uttering threats to damage property.

He and co-accused Omar Bulphred have been detained since their arrest on April 12, 2007, when nine counts were laid against them.

Ibragimov pleaded guilty to reduced charges last April. His time in custody will be counted as double in any jail sentence handed down, or three years as of this month.

Ibragimov's lawyer, Gaetan Bourassa, asked for a suspended sentence with 240 hours of community service and three years' probation. Bourassa argued that his client is immature and was led on by Bulphred, who he said planned the attacks.

Bulphred, 22, has pleaded not guilty and is due back in court Nov. 12 to set a date for his trial. Ibragimov read a statement of apology and asked for a second chance to prove he can change.

The Quebec Court judge Gilles Cadieux will render his sentence on Nov. 17.

Sharon Home dedicates newly expanded branch

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Fred Narvey had lived at the north Winnipeg Kanee Centre of the Sharon Home Retirement Homes since 2005.

"I didn't think there could be a better place to live than the Kanee Centre," said the still spry 95-year-old, speaking at the dedication of the newly expanded Saul and Claribel Simkin Centre, the Sharon Home's south Winnipeg branch, late last month. "I was wrong. I have never seen such a beautiful place."

Others agreed with his impression. Kerri Irving-Ross, Manitoba's minister for healthy living, described the facility as "amazing." Jack Litvack, chair of the organization's expansion implementation committee, said the Simkin Centre is one of the finest personal care homes in Canada.

Jonathan Kroft, president of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg, said "the centre is a wonderful benefit to the community."

Winnipeg has had a Jewish "old folks home" in the north end since 1912. The Sharon Home had been at the same north end address since 1940. The seniors residence there, which was modernized several times over the years, had 157 beds.

Seen at the ribbon-cutting at the Saul and Claribel Simkin Centre dedication is resident Fred Narvey.

In keeping with the growing Jewish community in south Winnipeg in recent years, and the corresponding decrease in the Jewish population in the north end, the community first built a south Winnipeg branch of the Sharon Home – the Saul and Claribel Simkin Centre – in 2002. That facility cost $12 million to build, including $3 million raised within the community, and had 72 beds. Meal were prepared in the north end residence and delivered to the new centre.

The new work on the south end Sharon Home – Phase II of a three-phase process – cost $31 million, $6 million of which was raised in the Jewish community. It increased the number of beds to 200. With the completion of this second phase, all the residents of the north Winnipeg facility were transferred to the south Winnipeg building.

The Kanee Centre is to be used as a government-administered home for people with mental health and/or addiction problems.

At the Simkin Centre dedication ceremony, Sandra Delorme, the Sharon Home's president and CEO for the past six years, pointed out some of the highlights of the expanded facility, including two completely separate kitchens (one for meat and one for dairy), a new synagogue (the synagogue, which was dedicated following the speeches, formerly shared space with the multipurpose room) and areas dedicated to the memories of the Kanee and Simkin Families.

She also spoke about the centre's walking track – the first such walking track in a nursing home in North America – where residents recovering from hip surgery or a stroke can use a sling to relieve the weight on the damaged area while they learn to walk again.

In the latest in resident safety, she said, every resident and every staff person has a computerized badge so that everyone can be tracked at any given time.

Delorme described the welcoming reception residents coming from the north Winnipeg home received on arrival at their new home. "Our entire staff gathered at the front entrance to welcome each group [of about 20] as they arrived," she said.

Speaking for her family, Jacqueline Simkin (one of the late Saul and Claribel's daughters) recalled her parents' long connection with the Sharon Home.

"My baba [on the Simkin side] and my Uncle Joe and Auntie Clara [Saul Simkin's sister] were cared for at the Sharon Home in their latter years," she said. "My father used to visit every Shabbat, and my mother would be there every afternoon."

She described how her father and his brothers built BACM into one of western Canada's largest construction companies.

"My mother was involved with the John Howard and Elizabeth Fry Society (organizations whose goal is to rehabilitate ex-convicts). My father made it a practice to hire ex-convicts."

She noted that her mother kept up a correspondence with Albert Schweitzer and helped establish a group home for troubled teenagers.

In the Jewish community, Saul Simkin was a chair of a United Jewish Appeal campaign and a leading member of Rosh Pina Synagogue.

"My parents never forgot their modest origins," Simkin said.

Among the other speakers at the dedication were Leonard Asper, who chaired the Bring Us All Together fundraising campaign, and Real Cloutier, who brought greetings from the Winnipeg Regional Health Authority. Bob Kopstein, chair of the Sharon Home's board of directors, noted that the completion of the physical foundation – the steel and cement – ensures the building's physical stability through the years.

The dedication ceremony concluded with words by the Sharon Home's spiritual leader, Rabbi Neal Rose, and the chanting of K'El Maleh Rachamim by Cantor Anibal Maas of the Shaarey Zedek Synagogue. The Torahs were carried in and placed in the Ark of the new synagogue by rabbis Alan Green of Shaarey Zedek and Larry Lander, spiritual leader of Congregation Etz Chayim, Cantor Gerry Daien of Chevra Mishnayes Synagogue and the Sharon Home's Cantor Stephen Hyman.

Cantor donates kidney to his mom

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

To become a parent is to give life to another generation, but no parent ever thinks that their child will end up giving them a second lease on life.

"In my case, they both started to deteriorate at the same time," said Sima, now 63.

"They couldn't really figure out what was going on. There is no history of kidney disease in my family," her son added.

Sima was placed on a waiting list for an organ donation. She was told that the wait would be four to five years, and in the meantime, she'd have to be on peritoneal dialysis, which uses a filtration process to clean the blood inside the body.

"I was on dialysis for only a year-and-a-half. I was very lucky... I got a cadaver transplant. But the kidney started failing. It was good for about 12 years," Sima said.

In 2006, Sima found herself back on dialysis.

"At that time, my mom was on peritoneal dialysis five times a day. She was waking up at 3 o'clock in the morning for her dialysis," David, 31, said.

"It was very invasive on her life and she couldn't really travel. It was very difficult."

His mother was put back on the waiting list for a kidney, but this time, doctors forecasted an eight- or nine-year wait.

Troubled by the idea that his mother would be figuratively chained to a dialysis machine for nine years, he looked into the option of donating his kidney.

"I asked her, 'If I was match, would you consider it?' And she said, 'No, you're not going through with this. You have your life to live,'" David recalled.

In spite of her objections, he got tested to see if he was a match.

"He went behind my back. I didn't want him to do it. I'm a Jewish mother and I didn't want to hurt my son," Sima said.

"I had done a lot of research on it and found out that the only restriction I would really have was that I wouldn't be able to play contact sports, but I wasn't really worried about my football career, because I never planned to have one," David said.

When he told his mother that he was a match, she was hesitant, but she came around after learning about the benefits.

"The kidney lasts 50 per cent longer if it comes from a [relative rather] than a cadaver, and there is less of a chance of it being rejected," David said.

Selfless act changed quality of Sima's life

"The chances of dying [from the operation] are less than one per cent. The only other greater risk is possibly high blood pressure later in life, but there are so many other factors that cause that, it's hard to tell [if that is linked to the kidneys]."

He added that there was about an 85 per cent to 95 per cent chance that the donation would be a success.

"We spoke to social workers [at the hospital] and they told us we had nothing to worry about, because we're both healthy. I just worried about his health because if he loses his other kidney, what has he got? He'd be on dialysis… But your positive attitude made me want to take it, too," Sima said to her son during an joint interview with The CJN.

Twelve months later, in July 2007, just a year after Sima was put back on dialysis, David underwent the surgery.

"I was back at work in three weeks. It was really nothing in the grand scheme of things," he said.

"The technology is so amazing. My surgery was laparoscopic [a minimally invasive surgery that is performed through small incisions] and my scar is only 2-1/2 inches."

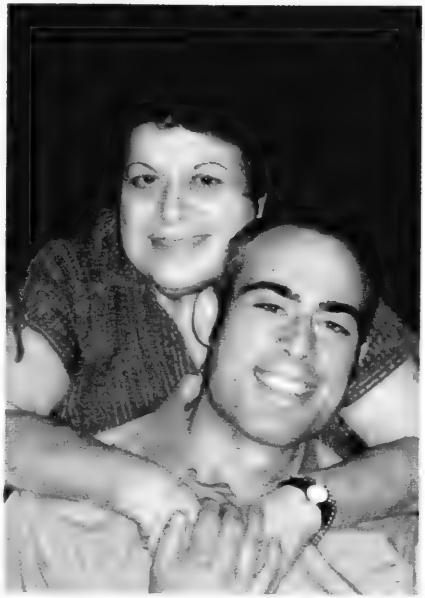
Not only did her son's selfless donation change the quality of her life, but it also motivated her and her husband to take better care of themselves.

David said he made them sign a contract that they would look after their health.

"She's done a great job of that. She exercises regularly… My dad also had to take of himself, and he recently lost more than 90 pounds," David said.

He said he was inspired to share his story after reading a recent article in The CJN by Rabbi Reuven Bulka titled "Destroying Jewish myths about organ donation"(July 17, 2008).

In it, Rabbi Bulka wrote that there is a common "presumption made by many that [since] Judaism insists on burial after death, and that by donating an organ, that body part is not buried" that organ donation is prohibited.



Sima Rosen, with her son, Cantor David Rosen

"The premise is correct, but the conclusion is not," Rabbi Bulka wrote.

"[S]aving a life is a vital mitzvah that is praised and encouraged as the most noble deed that we are humanly capable of… If after death, one can save a life with a body part, that is an overriding mitzvah, pikuach nefesh, that pre-empts the other competing mitzvah obligations," Rabbi Bulka added.

The rabbi's views resonate with David, who feels that the mitzvot of honouring your mother and father and of pikuach nefesh override any restriction on being buried with all your organs.

"When it's your mother, it's like a double commandment, because it's also kibud av v'em, honouring your mother and father. Essentially, she gave me life and if I can help prolong hers, that helped set all the fears aside."

David said he hopes that his story will encourage others to learn more about the issue.

"Before my mom had kidney failure, I didn't know anything about it. I didn't know I could donate an organ while I was still living. So, it's just to inform people and to say that you can do this and you can be tested, and you can save someone's life or make it significantly better and not impede your life very much," he said.

"It impacts your life in that you feel like you did something wonderful. I definitely feel a sense of accomplishment that I did this. It gives purpose in your life and makes you feel like you've done something worthwhile and significant, and hopefully it'll inspire others to do it."

Steinberg legacy lives on

Ben Dobrinsky, pictured here in 2005 at age 91, holds a copy of his painting of the original Steinberg store on "The Main" — St. Lawrence Boulevard. Dobrinsky spent his entire 50-year working career at Steinberg's, and has since been active in celebrating its history.

Founded in 1917 by Jewish immigrant Ida (Roth) Steinberg with only $200, Steinberg's grew to almost 200 stores at its peak and was Quebec's dominant grocery store chain and a true institution.

After expansion and corporate acquisitions that saw it operate in Toronto and elsewhere in Canada under the Miracle Food Mart and Dominion banners, the iconic retailer was recently acquired by food giant Metro Inc.

At right, Serge Boulanger, Vice-President of Marketing for Metro, stands in front of a recently rebannered store. With a launch campaign entitled "A Store Is Born," the company inherits not only a retail food operation but also a century-old legacy that began with a single grocery store.

New Alzheimer's treatment developed by Israeli

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

A potential new Alzheimer's drug being tested by Canadian and Israeli researchers is showing promising results, its discoverer said in Montreal.

Illana Gozes, director of the Adams Super Center for Brain Studies at Tel Aviv University (TAU), calls the research a breakthrough in the understanding of the disease's pathology, which should lead to a treatment that can halt and even reverse its course.

The drug AL-108, which targets the neurofibrillary "tangles" in the brain that characterize Alzheimer's disease, is being developed by the Vancouver-based biotechnology company Allon Therapeutics, which Gozes, its chief scientific officer, founded.

Gozes was in Montreal, at the invitation of the Canadian Friends of TAU and the Alzheimer Groupe, to report on the latest news about AL-108. "It is too early to speak of a cure, but there's hope that we may be able to change the course of the disease" by treating what is thought to be the cause, rather than by reducing its symptoms, as currently available therapies do.

No drug on the market today has any impact on these tangles, or the other hallmark of Alzheimer's, plaque accumulation in the brain, she said.

AL-108 was shown to improve short-term recall and what is termed working memory in a clinical trial involving 144 patients with abnormal forgetfulness, known as amnestic mild cognitive impairment (aMCI), which is considered a precursor to Alzheimer's. The research confirmed that those tangles do indeed seem to interfere with specific types of memory function, perhaps as much as the plaque buildup. The subjects otherwise functioned normally.

Gozes said the human trials are consistent with several animal studies that found that AL-108 reduced the tangles located inside neurons and increased memory function. In animals, AL-108 also reduced the plaque, which is outside neurons.

In people, the drug was found to be safe and produced no serious side effects – a small percentage of the subjects reported headaches, nasal congestion or irritation. AL-108 is administered through the nose in a spray.

The 144 patients, all Americans, were aged 55 to 85 years, and evenly divided between men and women. They were tested at 17 different centres, with the support of the U.S. National Institutes of Health.

They were divided into three groups: one was given a placebo, another AL-108 in a lower dose, and the third AL-108 in a higher dose over 12 weeks. The latter group, which received 15 milligrams twice daily, showed the most significant improvement in their memory, she said.

Before taking the drug or the placebo, the subjects were given widely used tests such as having to remember a series of numbers forward and backward, and picking out an image from a set that had been shown to them a few seconds before.

They were given the tests again at intervals of four, six or eight weeks.

The results were most dramatic in the numbers test, and the improvement, which was observed after only four weeks, was maintained four weeks after the drug was stopped, Gozes said.

They did not, however, show any improvement in tests that involve planning or abstract thinking, which suggests that aMCI is not related to what's termed executive function.

The drug is believed to target the regions of the brain associated with memory: the medial temporal lobe, hippocampus and prefrontal cortex.

AL-108, not only stops the formation of the tangles, but actually untangles them, she said. The drug is derived from naturally occurring proteins secreted by the brain, which have a protective effect against injury.

The tangles are the result of the degeneration of microtubules, the "conveyor belts" inside brain cells. The tangles occur when a protein called tau, which normally acts to hold the microtubules together, converts from a soluble to an insoluble form.

Gozes' animal studies have shown that AL-108 reverses the microtubules' deterioration and restores their density by increasing the levels of soluble tau.

Gozes and the clinical trial's principal investigator, Donald Schmechel, a Duke University geriatrics professor, reported on AL-108 at the International Conference on Alzheimer's Disease and Related Disorders held in Chicago this summer, which brought together more than 5,000 researchers, physicians and care providers from 60 countries.

Third-phase clinical trials on AL-108 are now underway, and the drug may be commercialized within five years. Allon Therapeutics (Allon is Gozes' maiden name) is a publicly traded company listed on the Toronto Stock Exchange.

Allon is now also conducting trials of AL-108 on schizophrenia patients and coronary bypass patients who suffer cognitive impairment.

Shir Libeynu cantor doubles as folk band's singer-songwriter

By RITA POLIAKOV
Special to The CJN

Singer, songwriter and cantor Daniela Gesundheit says she is motivated by fear.

To Daniela Gesundheit, a singer, songwriter and cantor, music can be terrifying.

"I like to choose something that scares me," she told Heebonics at a dimly lit café in the heart of Toronto's Kensington Market.

Contemplating her repertoire, Gesundheit looked intently into the green tea concoction in front of her.

"Have you ever tried something new?" she asked, taking a sip from her oversized mug.

"For me, it's constantly terrifying. I get to a level, I play the song perfectly, I record a record with that song, and at the end, I have to start over again, write a new song.

"I think, being honest with ourselves, there's no such thing as true mastery. The more you look into something, the more you feel baffled by it. If you finally understand something, there's no reason to live," she said, shrugging.

"Well, I guess you can teach it, but then you'd be new at teaching."

Gesundheit, the founder and lead singer of the folk band Snowblink with bandmate Dan Goldman, grew up in Los Angeles, moved to San Francisco and then moved to Toronto this past summer.

Apart from performing, the 26-year-old is the cantor at Congregation Shir Libeynu, an unaffiliated liberal shul in downtown Toronto.

"I have enormous amounts to learn about Judaism. Every time I go to study it, I feel I really know nothing," she said.

For Gesundheit, Shir Libeynu ("song of our hearts" in Hebrew), which holds services that include ancient and modern prayers and music, is a good fit.

"It's a strange experience to be a new cantor in a congregation and a leader. It's challenging, but [the community] is being very supportive. It's a community that wants to take responsibility for their own Judaism.

"They're not going to shul because they think they have to, they really want to be involved, they want to be moved... and music is a huge focus, that resonated," she said.

"The way I found to communicate with the world is through singing. All the prayers are set to... really beautiful music."

Gesundheit connected to music at a young age. As a child, she would sing sentences rather than say them.

"I went to a Jewish day school and went to synagogue. I always sang. Jewish music was the first music that I learned," she said, pausing to glance at a paper lantern hanging from the ceiling above her.

She continued, saying, "I guess I started writing songs when I was 14."

At that time, her older brother died in a car accident, and then three years later, tragedy struck her again when her first boyfriend died of a brain aneurysm. This caused Gesundheit to step away from religion.

"There was a gap... After my boyfriend passed away, I was just angry about religion. I felt I had to do my own inquiries. I don't know when it turned around, it was just a matter of time passing," she said.

"Halfway through my university career, I got re-interested in Judaism. I got back into studying text and music."

While Gesundheit began to reconnect with her religion, something at shul still bothered her.

"I always found myself attending services and being distracted by the fact that [I thought] 'I can do this better. I can think of so many ways I can make this more meaningful,'" she said.

About a year ago, Gesundheit plunged into her first job as a cantor at a synagogue in Mammoth Lakes, Calif.

"I heard they needed a cantor, I jumped in. I think being a prayer leader was pretty terrifying... My voice had to represent [the congregation's] voice. It all went well, it felt right to be there."

While Gesundheit plans to continue working with synagogues, she also finds time to focus on her music, which she said is influenced by Dolly Parton and Enya, among others.

For Gesundheit, who plays electric guitar, the lyrics in her songs are as important as the melody.

"I'm very concerned with words in music. Choosing the right words is vital. Usually, there's just a lot of time with the dictionary. When writing lyrics, I look up words that I know the meaning to," she said, adding that images are important, as well.

"For me, images are really tangible."

After a pause, she continued, saying, "I've had this problem before. I was finishing a record, and I was trying to say, 'I want this to sound like the paws of a bunny rabbit.'" Another pause.

"I guess you'd think if I were to touch a bunny, it gives me a sensation. Anything you do produces a sensation in your body. [I] should be able to create art that can translate that."

While Gesundheit doesn't write obviously religious lyrics, her spirituality and music often intersects.

"[My music] can easily be compared to prayer. In practice, they're still two separate things. I don't play Snowblink in the synagogue. [But] they totally inform each other, Hebrew phrases will show up in songs," she said.

For more about Shir Libeynu and Snowblink, visit www.shirlibeynu.ca and www.snowblink.org.

Jerusalem parade attracts thousands

Some 7,000 Christian tourists visited Jerusalem for Sukkot. They were joined by many Israelis who took part in the festive march through the downtown of the capital. The pilgrims came for the 29th annual Christian celebration of the Feast of Tabernacles, which is sponsored by the International Christian Embassy Jerusalem (ICEJ). The tourists, from all over the world, were expected to inject some $18 million to $20 million into the economy, an ICEJ news release said. "Their [Christian tourists] presence here at this particular time also constitutes a major statement of solidarity with Israel as it confronts the growing threat of a nuclear Iran, while also bringing a major financial injection into the local economy at a very critical moment," said Rev. Malcolm Hedding, the ICEJ's executive director.

JORCAJT AND INVESTMENT:
REDISCOVERING JEWISH ROOTS IN HUNGARY

Interview with Mr. Jenő Freund
the leader of the Orthodox Israelite Community in Miskolc, Hungary.

Mr. Freund, please introduce yourself to our readers. What is your family background, how did you become head of the community and what goals motivate you in your work?

I am Jenő Freund, a 61 year-old businessman. I was born into a practicing Orthodox Jewish family in Sátoraljaújhely and my parents and grandparents saw great importance in continuing ancient traditions. I came to Miskolc in 1972, where I was married. My wife's family are also deeply religious and my father-in-law rose to the rank of shochet and enjoyed great respect in the community. Some 20 years ago, I was offered the position of leader (chairman, we call it in Hungarian), which I accepted in memory of my father. Right up until her death, my mother was Mesgiah - supervisor and manager - of the kosher kitchen. Over the past 20 years, I have developed a close relationship with city leaders, and our Orthodox community is known all over the world. In recent years, maintaining religious life has been my main objective, and I have achieved great success through a focus on observing prayers and festivals.

During the decades of socialism, northern Hungary was the country's bastion of heavy industry. In recent years, this sector has been gradually eroded and has now almost disappeared. Nevertheless, figures show that this is now one of Hungary's most dynamically developing regions. What is driving this growth?

The economic drivers of northern Hungary lie in inexpensive labour and untapped natural and cultural resources. The many areas that can benefit from investment in economic infrastructure and tourism are only now being discovered. The region has grown into the fulcrum between the former socialist countries and the EU.

You are a successful businessman and are very familiar with the economy of the region. What sectors or areas would you recommend to foreign investors?

I would emphasise the potential of religious tourism, which has been attracting increasing attention not only in Europe, but all over the world. For example, a great number of tzadik rabbi tombs and monuments can be found throughout the country, particularly in Borsod county, attracting thousands of religious leaders and their followers. These people have great influence - both economically and politically - in the countries they are based. Maintaining the memory of parents, relatives, roots and teachers is very important in the Jewish religion. There is no other way that Jewish identity and tradition can be authentically maintained. These religious leaders can offer assistance to historic towns and villages in memory of their parents. With regard to the region as a whole, the greatest assistance is the creation of jobs, something welcomed with open arms everywhere you go.

The Shoah led to the death of 600,000 Hungarian Jews, many of whom lived in the northern areas of Hungary. Some survived in Hungary, but those that were more fortunate left the country while they still could and settled in happier parts of the world. Why do you think they or their children might be interested in returning to or investing in a country that once rejected them?

Indeed, the Jewish communities of north-eastern Hungary were all but destroyed by the Shoah. Those few that remain, however, continue to observe unique traditions that would otherwise be lost for ever. The people living in these areas maintained centuries of tradition despite the horrors of the 20th century, a great achievement in the eyes of the world's great Jewish communities. The community in Miskolc has worked hard to maintain the respect of the global Orthodox community, whose leaders, with their influence extending beyond religion, believe in our local knowledge and recommendations and can be relied upon for considerable funding. This close contact can only be nurtured through the ancient customs of the Jewish faith.

Latest from ITD Hungary:

In the frame of a roadshow a group of leading Hungarian biotech companies will hold presentations in the largest cities of Canada between 3-7 November 2008. Those interested should write to info@itd.hu. For regular updates about the event visit www.itd.hu.

Jewish soldier attacked at U.S. base

By LORI GROSS
JTA

NEW YORK — All sides agree that a beating last month left a Jewish U.S. Army trainee, Michael Handman, with facial wounds, severe oral injuries and a concussion. What's in dispute is whether the assault – at the base in Fort Benning, Ga. – was carried out by multiple attackers, and if it was the product of an anti-Semitic campaign waged by Handman's superiors.

The military has charged just one person, a fellow trainee, and insists that he was not motivated by anti-Semitism. Handman's supporters, on the other hand, believe multiple attackers were involved and feel the incident was connected to anti-Jewish slurs dished out to Handman by two company drill sergeants.

Military officials declined to make Handman available for comment, and separate efforts to reach him were unsuccessful. His mother, Randi Handman, told JTA that her son only remembers being called into the laundry room to retrieve clothing, being struck and spun on his back while sorting through a pile and then covering his head to shield it from blows before drifting into the blackness of a concussion. He says several recruits were in the room before the beating commenced, his mother added.

Just days before the Sept. 24 assault, the two drill sergeants were issued letters of reprimand, in which they were accused by the military of addressing Handman with anti-Jewish slurs, including "Juden." In the base's mess hall, one of the drill sergeants also demanded that he remove his yarmulke, which he had begun to wear in the few weeks following his induction.

Though army regulation allows for individuals to wear a yarmulke, praying while on guard duty – which Handman was rebuked for – is against regulation, because soldiers must limit their focus to guarding weapons. According to his mother, Handman says that he was not praying, but merely reading Jewish canon – three feet from where another guard had been reading the New Testament undisturbed.

She also said that prior to the assault, she received a foreboding letter from her son, warning her that he would be attacked.

"I have just never been so discriminated against/humiliated about my religion," he wrote, adding: "I just feel like I'm always looking over my shoulder. Like my battle buddy heard some of the guys in my platoon talking about how they wanted to beat the shit out of me tonight when I'm sleeping. It just sucks. And the only justification they have is [because] I'm Jewish. Maybe your dad was right… The army is not the place for a Jew."

The case has attracted the attention of Mikey Weinstein, leader of the Military Religious Freedom Foundation, an outfit that fights alleged religious bias in the U.S. military. Weinstein, whose foundation has launched its own investigation of the beating, says that the drill sergeants referred to Handman as "f… Jew" and kike. According to Weinstein, platoon members attempted to dispirit Handman by ejaculating in his pillow.

Handman's father, Jonathan, contacted U.S. Senator Saxby Chambliss in the hopes that he would take an interest in the investigation, and urge the military to switch his son to a less hostile company. In response to the senator's inquiries, Fort Benning's Deputy Chief of Staff Samuel Selby Rollinson wrote that he does not condone the actions of the non-commissioned officers in slurring Handman and denying him the right to wear a yarmulke or attend Jewish prayer services. But, Rollinson added, their actions were "not meant to be malicious, and were done out of ignorance for regulations and cultural awareness."

Military police have concluded that Handman was attacked by a lone assailant, a fellow trainee who they refuse to identify, citing army regulations. The suspect has been charged by military police with assault and is subject to yet-to-be determined penalties, including 45 days of restricted movement, extra duty, reduction in grade and forfeiture of pay. Military officials denied JTA requests to speak with the private who was charged in the assault.

Handman has been moved out of his original platoon to a rehabilitation platoon to recuperate from his injuries, and is now in a different battalion.

When asked through what method of investigation it was determined that the non-commissioned officers "inadvertently" violated the private's religious rights, a spokesperson for Rollinson, Monica Manganaro, said that they acted "out of character," are experienced drill sergeants and had a superb record of performance up until this incident.

Weinstein said that the military frequently attempts to portray such incidents as one-time occurrences. He criticized the army's choice of Lt. Dan Kim to lead the investigation of the motives behind the assault, saying that he would ultimately be the one accountable for prevalent misconduct.

According to army officials, Kim spent days gathering 100 sworn testimonies from every member of Handman's company, all of whom denied that religious prejudice was pervasive, or that it provoked the beating.

Fort Benning's spokesperson was unaware of the "battle buddy" who Handman said had warned him of a pending assault fuelled by anti-Semitism. According to the spokesperson, Kim and military police officials say they have uncovered another motive during the investigation, but military privacy regulations prohibit her from sharing that information.

Weinstein argued that the sworn testimony of the privates is unreliable, since it was solicited by a lieutenant who ranks above them.

Claims that a conflict of interest exists were dismissed by an army spokeswoman, who pointed out that Kim answers to his superior, the battalion commander, and is obligated to render a truthful investigation.

Weinstein criticized the penalty, saying it was an outrage that the assailant was not even given the lowest form of a court martial. Handman's father called the punishment "cute" and merely a slap on the wrist.

Peres grants Livni extra two weeks to form coalition

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — President Shimon Peres on Monday granted prime minister-designate, Kadima chair Tzipi Livni, an extra two weeks to form a government coalition.

By law, the prime minister-designate may ask the president for an extension of two weeks, in addition to the four weeks initially given, to form a coalition.

So far, Livni has initialed a coalition agreement with the Labor party. However, talks with Shas and the haredi United Torah Judaism (UTJ) remain stalled.

On Sunday, Shas spiritual leader Rabbi Ovadia Yosef instructed party chair Eli Yishai not to compromise on child allowance payments, as Kadima and Shas party negotiators ended their latest coalition talks without reaching an agreement. The sides were to meet again this week after Simchat Torah.

Shas and the Kadima party negotiating team are trying to find agreement on allowances for family payments in 2009. Kadima has offered Shas an overall welfare package of about NIS 600 million (about $160 million US), to be drawn from various budgetary sources.

Tzipi Livni

Livni's associates said Saturday that she intends to present her government on Oct. 27, the day the Knesset's winter session begins. One possible scenario has her presenting a "narrow" coalition of 59 to 60 members of Knesset, including Meretz MKs, and supported from outside the coalition by UTJ. She would then work to bring Shas and UTJ into the coalition at a later date.

Sources close to Livni said she believes it is important to present the new government on the first day of the Knesset's winter session, but would continue her efforts to bring Shas and UTJ into the coalition in the remaining days.

Senior Kadima officials said Saturday that Livni was willing to compromise on the allowances, but Shas did not seem to want to do so, and the question was whether they had decided not to enter a Livni coalition.

"Shas is important for a wide and stable government, but we can't wait too long or compromise on the entire sum they want," a senior Kadima official said.

Meanwhile, Defence Minister Ehud Barak, chair of the Labor party, warned that the agreement between Labor and Kadima initialed last week might not be signed if Labor's demand for an additional representative on the judicial appointments committee was not met.

Barak hinted that he would not oppose the Shas budgetary demands, although he is against child allowances according to the old system.

Senior Labor party members have been in talks with senior Shas representatives over the past week to persuade them to join Livni's cabinet.

Acre Arab driver arrested

The Arab driver who touched off days of rioting in the mixed Jewish and Arab city of Acre has been arrested. Jamal Taufik was arrested and charged with reckless driving, endangering lives and offending religious sensibilities. The Haifa District Court also suspended his driver's license for one month. Taufik denies that he drove through a Jewish area on Yom Kippur eve, Oct. 8, in order to incite the city's Jews, saying he was only driving to pick up his daughter. Eyewitnesses told Israeli media that he blasted his car stereo, was smoking and driving at high speeds through the streets. The five days of riots between Jewish and Arab youths resulted in extensive damage to property in Acre. A large police presence continues to patrol the city's Arab and Jewish sectors. Last week, Arab leaders issued a statement condemning Taufik's actions.

Ban slams Hezbollah

Hezbollah is undermining the UN-brokered ceasefire that ended the 2006 Lebanon war, the UN secretary general said. "Hezbollah's maintenance of a major armed component and a paramilitary infrastructure separate from the state, including a secure network of communication, which the group itself deems an integral part of its arsenal, is a direct challenge to the authority of the government of Lebanon and its security forces and prevents their exclusive control over the entire territory of Lebanon," Ban Ki-moon said in his report to the UN Security Council on compliance with UN resolutions aimed at bringing stability to Lebanon.

Third firebomber killed

Israeli troops killed three Palestinian firebombers in three days last week. Israeli forces in the West Bank shot and killed a Palestinian last Thursday as he prepared to hurl a Molotov cocktail at them. The incident took place near the Palestinian village of Kufr Malik, according to Ha'aretz. Last Wednesday's deadly incident took place near Ramallah, when a Palestinian mob attacked an IDF position. On Tuesday, IDF troops shot a Palestinian teenager near the Jewish settlement of Beit El. The troops found ten other Molotov cocktails next to the teen's body. Palestinian sources told Ynetnews the youths were throwing rocks, not firebombs.

Benedict may shun Israel over Pius

Israeli President Shimon Peres urged Pope Benedict XVI not to put off a visit to Israel over a disagreement about Pope Pius XII. A Catholic official was quoted by the Italian media as saying that the Pope would not come to Israel as long as a photo caption at the Yad Vashem Holocaust memorial alleging that Pius XII did not act to save Jews from the Nazis remains on display. The Pope has expressed interest in visiting Israel, and Israel recently extended an official invitation. Peres said the Pius issue should not be a barrier. "The visit to the holy country has nothing to do with anger or disputes," he told reporters in Jerusalem. "It's holy all the time, it's holy for all of us." Benedict said last week that he hoped Pius XII, who served from 1939 to 1958, would be beatified, the first step toward sainthood, without controversy.

Israeli Jews and Arabs find hope in microfinance fund

By KARIN KLOOSTERMAN
Israel 21c

JERUSALEM — The cost of housing in Jerusalem is soaring and the disparity between rich and poor is growing wider, while trust between Arabs and Jews remains thin.

The issue of poverty was especially dire for Jerusalem's poorer Orthodox Jews and religious Muslims during recent Jewish new year celebrations and the Muslim holiday of Ramadan.

As in North America during Thanksgiving and Christmas time, the poor in Israel suffer during holiday time. There are reports of food shortages in the local newspapers, and food banks beg for donations. Charitable acts take on a deeper meaning for those who have the means to give – and they do give. But what about the rest of the year?

In the Jewish religion, the highest form of charity is helping a person earn his or her own living. Following this age-old tradition, and merging it to complement Muslim laws in charitable giving, is a new NGO – the Jerusalem Interest-free Microfinance Fund (JIMF) – which has initiated a scheme to give interest-free loans to help Jerusalem's poor start their own businesses.

Borrowing models from the laws in both religions – including prohibitions to accept interest-based loans – the JIMF, founded by two United Kingdom citizens, follows a worldwide trend of microfinancing, especially in the area of the environment.

In Jerusalem, new opportunities for building businesses can break down barriers of suspicion between Israeli Arabs and Jews, reduce religious fanaticism and lead to a more prosperous city and region for all, said JIMF founders Donald Franklin and Michael Pollak. They also hope it will break down barriers in philanthropy, with each faith currently tending to support its own.

According to Franklin, an economist, the JIMF could lead to change, since both Jews and Muslims give a percentage of their earnings to those less fortunate – "tzedakah" in Judaism and "zakat" in Islam. "We want to comply with Halachah [Jewish] and sharia [Islamic] law," he said, noting that the words "tzedakah" and "zakat" come from the same root, meaning path or way.

"I was anxious to find a way of extending contact [between Islam and Judaism] which was more constructive," Franklin told ISRAEL21c.

JIMF advisers Fiyaz Mughal and Jafar Sabbah help decide which of the would-be entrepreneurs in Jerusalem will receive some of the $200,000 in financing the NGO has already collected. Part of the JIMF's service will be business training to the borrower, giving the loan extra value, while loan repayment will be enforced by either the Jewish courts – the beit din – or by the elders in the Muslim communities, depending on the recipient.

If the model works, Franklin is hoping that similar micro-loan initiatives can extend throughout the region, maybe even in the Palestinian Authority – where the Al Rafah Microfinancing Bank is set up but is currently unable to provide loans, he said.

Haider's death adds to political turmoil

By RUTH ELLEN GRUBER
JTA

VIENNA — The death of Joerg Haider, a controversial and charismatic right-wing politician in Austria, has removed one of the country's key players at a time of political turmoil following unprecedented far-right gains in last month's general elections.

Haider, 58, was killed early Saturday when he lost control of his car and crashed while passing another vehicle at nearly 90 miles an hour – twice the posted speed limit.

"For us, it's the end of the world," Stefan Petzner, a spokesperson for Haider's Alliance for Austria's Future party, tearfully told reporters. "Joerg Haider was a politician who changed the face of politics in this country."

Indeed, though he didn't hold national office, Haider was arguably Austria's best-known – and most polarizing – political figure. At the time of his death, he was the governor of the Carinthia province.

Known for his anti-immigrant and anti-European Union policies, Haider was a populist who played on voter frustration with the status quo and an instinctive political animal who knew how to tailor his rhetoric, appearance and demeanor to suit his target audiences.

"By constantly attacking Austria's ruling elite and reminding working-class voters that they were getting precious little indeed from this system, Haider not only made his party a major player, he single-handedly forced the ruling elites to begin tacking ever right-wards," said Edward Serotta, the director of Centropa, a Vienna-based research institute on Jewish life in Central Europe.

Handsome, athletic and perpetually suntanned, Haider was dubbed the "yuppie fascist" by critics. The son of Nazi supporters, he won international notoriety in the 1990s with statements apparently praising the Hitler regime.

Haider led the far-right Freedom Party, or FPO, from 1986 to 2005, when he broke away to form the Alliance. Under his leadership, the FPO won 27 per cent of the vote in 1999, enabling the party to enter the government coalition. This sparked international sanctions, demonstrations and street riots, and prompted calls by Israel and Jewish groups to isolate the country.

Two years later, amid disarray and infighting, the party and its support collapsed.

In the Sept. 28 elections, however, the Alliance and the Freedom Party together made a stunning recovery, capturing 29 per cent of the vote – 18 per cent for the FPO and 11 per cent for the Alliance.

Joerg Haider

The total, nearly triple what the far right won in elections two years ago, was the best showing for the far-right forces in Austria since World War II.

Anti-immigrant and anti-European Union rhetoric was only part of the appeal. Commentators said anger and frustration at the Social Democrats and the conservative Peoples Party, the two mainstream parties that have divided power in Austria since World War II, played a major role.

"To conclude that close to 30 per cent of all Austrians have suddenly ideologically moved to the right is certainly a false assumption," wrote Vienna's Die Presse newspaper. "The reasons for the comet-like rise of the right lies, rather, in the behaviour of the long-established people's parties. And this indeed poses a threat for the freedom of opinion and ideas in Austria."

The far right captured nearly half of the voters younger than 30.

Salzburg-based historian Stan Nadel said this represented the most "shocking" aspect of the poll. These young voters "don't, for the most part, seem to be hard-core fascists, but their willingness to accept the near neo-Nazi backgrounds and statements of the leaders of the two parties is a bit frightening," he said.

"The far rightists' campaign in the discos and among the young and, as a result, are often seen as 'cool' and 'authentic' by a generation whose political education seems to leave much to be desired."

It is too soon to gauge the impact of Haider's death on Austria's political landscape. The electoral results had thrust both Haider and Freedom Party leader Hans Christian Strache into the political spotlight as the Peoples Party and the Social Democrats frantically sought to assemble a viable coalition.

"Strache may be well placed to come in first in the next election if the Social Democrats and the People's Party don't form a successful coalition," Nadel said.

Conversely, Nadel and others said that without Haider's charismatic presence, the far right could "implode."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

A nostalgic look at Cuban Jews, now and then

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Thomas Wolfe, the great American novelist, coined a phrase when he said, "You can't go home again." Ruth Behar, a professor of anthropology at the University of Michigan, turns that time-worn saying on its head.

Born in Havana, Behar left Cuba with her family after the 1959 revolution, when she was only five years old.

Growing up in New York City, she had no memories of Cuba. But one day, as she gazed at her parents and grandparents' photographs of their lives in Cuba before the dawn of the Fidel Castro era, she was overcome by nostalgia and a desire to go back to her "lost home" on that "beloved island."

In 1979, she finally got her chance, going to Cuba for a week to conduct research for her PhD dissertation. She was there during a brief thaw in U.S.-Cuban relations.

She returned in the 1990s in a personal capacity. "I simply wanted to be a Jew in Cuba," she writes in her poignant memoir, An Island Called Home: Returning to Jewish Cuba (Rutgers University Press).

Having whetted her appetite, Behar returned to Cuba again and again. "The more I went to Cuba, the more I needed to go. I had become a Cuba addict. I needed my fix."

She adds, "After a few months of being away from the island, I started to feel an intense desire to return… I missed Cuban voices, Cuban streets, Cuban sunlight."

In An Island Called Home, Behar explores Cuba in terms of its history of Jewish settlement and its present-day Jewish community. Her supple text is supplemented by the vivid photographs of Cuban photographer Humberto Mayol.

Like most Cuban Jews, the Behars arrived in Cuba in the early 20th century. Behar's grandmother, Esther, a Polish Jew from the town of Goworowo who died in 2000 in Miami Beach, immigrated to Havana in 1927 at the age of 19, hoping to become a cabaret singer. Instead, she married Behar's grandfather, Maximo, and worked with him in his fabric shop.

Centuries before Esther's arrival, Conversos, or Spanish Jewish converts to Christianity, were the first Jews to set foot in Cuba.

Completely assimilated, they were followed by Jews from the United States in the wake of the 1898 Spanish-American War and by Sephardi Jews from the Ottoman Empire in the early 1900s.

Ashkenazi Jews, mainly from Poland, came next. They made such an impact that Cubans assumed that all Cuban Jews were from Poland. Henceforth, they generally referred to Jews as polaco, or Pole.

Behar suggests that many Jews, particularly from Poland, considered Cuba a stepping-stone to the United States. Indeed, they referred to Cuba as "Hotel Cuba," regarding it as a temporary lodging, not a real home.

Until World War II, however, they had few opportunities to settle in the United States due to its restrictive immigration policy.

According to Behar, Jews were not allowed to become Cuban citizens in the 1920s, but when citizenship became attainable in the 1930s, it was too costly for most Jewish immigrants.

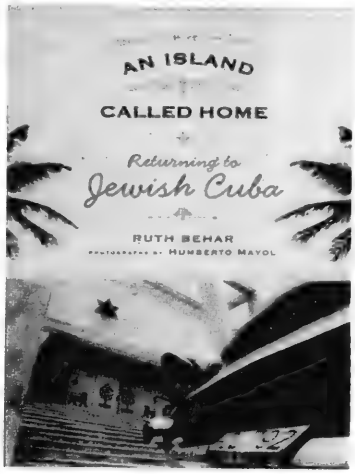
The vast majority of Jews operated mom-and-pop shops in Havana and provincial cities, but a handful were wealthy merchants who ran large stores and wholesale businesses.

By 1959, Cuba was home to about 15,000 Jews in a population of 16 million. The community was anchored by a wide range of social, cultural and educational institutions, and by synagogues in Havana, Santa Clara, Camaguey and Santiago de Cuba.

With Castro's ascendancy, nine out of 10 Jews emigrated, assuming that the revolution and capitalism were incompatible.

Initially, though, most Jews supported Castro's accession to power, Behar claims. "The Jews no longer thought of [Cuba] as Hotel Cuba. They had created a home, and they wanted a new country to arise, unfettered by the rampant corruption that had turned Cuba into a backyard colony of the Americans. They welcomed the reforms that sought to create greater equality."

Eventually, however, Jews soured on the revolution, realizing that Castro's embrace of communism would bring on the nationalization of property and schools, the control of the family by the state and the imposition of atheism, all of which would signal an end to Jewish religious life.



"When the Jews left Cuba, it was truly an exodus, for they fled quickly and en masse – nearly everyone gone by 1965," she says. "They departed with the urgency of a people who believed the sea had parted only long enough to let them go. The dissolution of the community was swift, intense, like a lit candle snuffed out by the wind."

Yet, as Behar discovered, Jewish life never completely disappeared.

Throughout the 1960s and 1970s, synagogues in Havana and Santiago de Cuba functioned with the participation of Jewish elders.

Meanwhile, the Canadian Jewish Congress provided the community with yearly shipments of Passover food. These so-called matzah packages, she observes, became "the last link that Jews in Cuba maintained to their heritage."

By the 1980s, the remaining Jews of Cuba were intermarried and had pulled away from religion. But a 1992 decree declaring Cuba a secular rather than an atheist state emboldened Cubans to return to their roots, Behar says.

"Seeking spiritual solace at a time when revolutionary ideals were crumbling, Cubans began to practise a range of religions," she writes, citing, among other faiths, Catholicism, Protestantism, Islam and Judaism.

Cuba's "new" Jewish community bears no resemblance to the pre-1959 community, "looking a lot like the rest of Cuba, a mix of white, black and everything in between," Behar says.

Most of its 1,500 members are descendants of "the uncounted Jews" who married Christians prior to the revolution and were assimilated.

"Only about 25 Jews in Cuba today are 'pure Jews,' people born of a Jewish mother and a Jewish father, though relative to their size they have played an important role in maintaining Jewish history and memory."

Although they are usually not well off financially, there are many professionals – doctors, engineers and lawyers – in the community.

Since 1992, more than 600 Jews have made aliyah, but only a small number stay on in Israel, acquire an Israeli identity and send their children to the army.

"Israel is too radically different a society for them to feel at home there as Cubans, and so inevitably the Jewish promised land becomes a stepping-stone to reach Miami, the Cuban promised land."

Cuba is officially pro-Palestinian and has had no diplomatic relations with Israel since 1973. But there is "wide admiration and respect for the Jewish people" in Cuba, and Cuban Jews suffer no discrimination, she writes.

Frost/Nixon is a meditation on politics and media

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

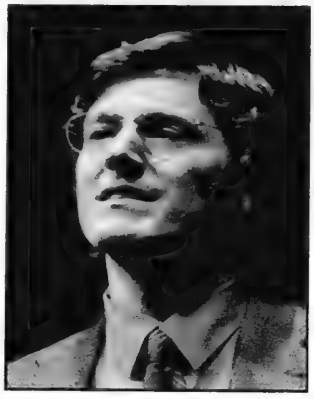
Vancouver actor Ari Cohen stars as American author Jim Reston in the Canadian Stage Company's production of Frost/Nixon.

Nominated for three Tony Awards and the winner of one, Frost/Nixon was written by the British author Peter Morgan, who wrote the screenplays for The Last King of Scotland and The Queen.

Frost/Nixon is a dramatization of a series of televised interviews that took place between disgraced U.S. president Richard Nixon and celebrity/playboy, British TV talk-show host David Frost in 1977. It was Nixon's first interviews after the 1974 Watergate scandal that forced his resignation from office. Frost solicited an admission of guilt from the former president, and 45 million TV viewers witnessed it.

Frost/Nixon is "an engaging, thrilling, fast-moving piece of theatre," Cohen says. "It is a meditation on politics and media – it has something to say about the power of the media and image that these days have a lot more prominence than ideas.

"Nixon was convicted in the eyes of public opinion through this media, in a way that the justice system in the United States had sort of failed. He first escaped conviction by resignation, and then, when pardoned by[former U.S. president] Gerald Ford, was then relieved of any responsibility for these crimes. It was an extraordinary moment in media history."



Ari Cohen

Jim Reston is both the narrator and a character in the play. In real life, he was the author of the book The Conviction of Richard Nixon: The Untold Story of the Frost/Nixon Interview.

"He was one of the main researchers for David Frost, in preparing the interviews with Richard Nixon," Cohen says. "A big part of how this play came about was [that] he chronicled the interviews while they were going on.

"Peter Morgan had seen an interview with Reston and contacted him. Reston took out the manuscript he hadn't looked at in 30 years and passed it along to Morgan. Morgan then wrote the play, essentially based on that manuscript… and then Reston published the manuscript as The Conviction of Richard Nixon."

Frost/Nixon premièred at the Donmar Warehouse in London, England, in 2006 before moving to Broadway in 2007. Cohen played Reston in Vancouver, where Frost/Nixon's run at the Vancouver Playhouse recently ended.

"Reston narrates the story, sets up the framework and fills in background information about Nixon and what was happening in American politics at the time," Cohen says. "It is a vast, complicated story. Reston is there to simplify the events. At one point, Reston asserts himself into the story and the rest of the play. Although he is still narrating, he is a participant as a researcher for David Frost.

"It is an interesting challenge to go in and out of the play and be communicating with the audience, and then drop in and play a scene with a few of the characters. It is certainly something I've never done before. I'm enjoying the experience of helping the audience through the story."

Cohen says that playwright Morgan wants theatregoers to first and foremost enjoy a satisfying, entertaining evening of theatre. Cohen said Morgan thinks the play has great resonance today, in light of the current administration in the United States, and would like audiences to be aware of the parallel.

A television, film and stage actor, Cohen has strong ties to the Jewish community in Winnipeg, where he was born and where some of the members of his family still live, but has been based in Vancouver for four years. He lives there with his actress wife, Lisa Ryder, and their two children, Talia, 3, and Daniel, 1.

Cohen's stage credits include his recent Jessie Award-nominated role in Noises Off in Vancouver and Toronto performances in Adam Pettle's Sunday Father and in actor-playwright Michael Healey's last two plays, Generous and Rune Arlidge, at the Tarragon Theatre. Healey also happens to be acting in Frost/Nixon.

Cohen has a recurring television role playing Reagan on Smallville. He had a part in The Tracey Fragments, a Bruce McDonald movie starring Ellen Page, which was filmed in Toronto last year.

Frost/Nixon runs until Nov. 8 at CanStage's Bluma Appel Theatre, 27 Front St. E. For tickets, call 416-368-3110; Ticketmaster, 416-872-1111; or visit www.canstage.com.

JEWISH COMMUNITY WELL REPRESENTED AT INTERNATIONAL AUTHORS FESTIVAL

The 29th annual International Festival of Authors, which runs Oct. 22 to Nov. 1 at Toronto's Harbourfront Centre, features some 135 authors from 15 countries in an ambitious schedule of readings, interviews and panel discussions.

Toronto authors include Cary Fagan, promoting his latest children's book, Thing-Thing. Fagan's novels include The Animals' Waltz, The Doctor's House and Other Fiction and Sleeping Weather; another is due in 2009. He's reading on Thursday, Oct. 30, 12:30 p.m.

Toronto poet Adam Sol is reading from Jeremiah, Ohio, his politically charged long poem that reinvents the biblical prophet and doomsayer Jeremiah for the postmodern age. Sol is involved in events on Oct. 28 and 31, both at 8 p.m.

Toronto-born Rivka Galchen, now of New York City, presents her first novel, Atmospheric Disturbances, about a woman who disappears, leaving behind another woman who looks, talks, behaves like, and claims to be, her. Her events are on Oct. 25, 26 and 29.

Ottawa writer Andrew Cohen reads from his latest book, Extraordinary Canadians: Lester B. Person. It is part of Penguin's Extraordinary Canadians series. Cohen's previous books include The Unfinished Canadian: The People We Are and While Canada Slept: How We Lost Our Place in the World. Hear him on Oct. 30, 8 p.m.

Out-of-country authors include David Benioff, who was born David Friedman in New York City: his father, Stephen Friedman, is the former head of Goldman Sachs. Benioff adapted his first novel, The 25th Hour, into a feature film directed by Spike Lee; he also adapted The Kite Runner for the screen. In his latest book, City of Thieves, which is set during the Leningrad blockade, an imprisoned teenage boy and Red Army soldier must secure a dozen fresh eggs in order to escape the firing squad. He's involved in two events on Oct. 25.

Dutch author Arnon Grunberg presents The Jewish Messiah, the story of a confused young man from a family with a Nazi past who devotes his life to alleviating Jewish suffering in his own way. "The wit and sardonic intelligence that shine through…make it a continual pleasure to read," said J. M. Coetzee. Grunberg appears on Oct. 25, 8 p.m., and Oct. 26, 12 p.m.

Sarajevo-born Aleksandar Hemon of Chicago reads from his debut novel, The Lazarus Project. The tale interweaves the stories of two young eastern European Jewish immigrants in Chicago separated by a century. Oct. 25, 8 p.m. and Oct. 26, 12 p.m.

Manhattan-born Nathaniel Rich's debut novel, The Mayor's Tongue, focuses on a college graduate and a World War II veteran whose parallel stories take them from New York to a fantastical Trieste, Italy, blurring the boundaries between imagination and reality. He's appearing on Oct. 30, 8 p.m., and Nov. 1, 12 p.m. For full festival details, visit the website www.readings.org.

How Jesus Became Christian: Barrie Wilson, author and professor at York University, discusses his recent book How Jesus Became Christian, an examination of how a young rabbi became the head of a religion. Beth Tzedec Congregation, 1700 Bathurst St. (south of Eglinton). Tuesday, Oct. 28, 7:30 p.m. Free admission; sponsored by the Max & Beatrice Wolfe Library.

Names in the News: The comedic sketch duo 7 Minutes In Heaven, consisting of Thornhill natives Josh Saltzman, 26, and Laura Cilevitz, 23, has been nominated for a Tim Sims Encouragement Award. Saltzman and Cilevitz have been writing and performing together for two years. Their troupe appeared at the Montreal Sketch Comedy Festival this summer to rave reviews. They are also members of the sketch troupe The Sketchersons. The Tim Sims Nominee Showcase is at Second City, 51 Mercer St. $10. Monday, Oct. 27. 416-343-0011, www.secondcity.com

God's Image in Art: Israeli art historian Gideon Ofrat, the Koffler Gallery's scholar-in-residence, joins a discussion with artist Evan Tapper and Rabbi Aaron Levy on "Is God in the Picture? God in Contemporary Jewish and Israeli Art." Presented by the Koffler Gallery, Hillel of Greater Toronto, the Annex Shul and Limmud Toronto. Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life, 36 Harbord St. Wednesday, Oct. 29, 7:30 p.m. Free admission.

Film Screenings: The Planet in Focus International Environmental Film & Video Festival (416-967-1528, www.planetinfocus.org) which runs Oct. 22 to 26 in Toronto, showcases more than 100 films, including:

• If Man Could Fly (Israel, 2007), directed by Yael Kipper Zaretzky, about a boy and a man who release captive birds and dream of flying. Canadian première on Sunday, Oct. 26, 11 a.m. Royal Ontario Museum.

• Birth of Smoked Meat (Canada, 2006), a 19-minute short, directed by Paul Zinder, about the Main Deli Steak House in Montreal. Toronto première on Oct. 24, 7 p.m. Gardiner Museum.

• Diet Leibovich (Israel, 2005), a 16-minute short directed by Avishag Leibovich, a whimsical look at food and families. Royal Ontario Museum, Sunday, Oct. 26, 7:30 p.m.

TRAVEL TALK

By BILL GLADSTONE

ISRAEL'S HOTEL SECTOR IS HOPPING

Despite the recent financial downturn, 2008 will still probably be Israel's best year for tourism, and tourism officials were optimistic that the boom will continue. All across Israel, hotels are expanding and upgrading, and new ones are being planned.

"The arrival of these hotels in Israel is an exciting development," said Oded Grofman, director of the Canada-Israel Government Tourist Office.

For instance:

• The Palace Hotel in Jerusalem, which the Waldorf-Astoria hotel group plans to renovate and reopen in 2010, was designed by a Turkish architect and built in 1929 in the heart of Jerusalem. The hotel was converted to government offices in the 1930s. The revamped hotel will add 250 upscale guest rooms and residential apartments to Israel's capital.

• The Dan Boutique is a 129-room hotel overlooking the Old City of Jerusalem, with a contemporary interior design that combines motifs from both East and West. It is located opposite Mount Zion near the old Turkish railway station complex, which is being transformed into an animation centre and entertainment hub.

• The Alrov Mamilla Jerusalem Hotel is also reaching new heights in design and luxury. The five-star deluxe hotel features architecture by Moshe Safdie and design by Pierro Lissoni. Superbly positioned, it is surrounded by fine gourmet kosher restaurants, dynamic bars and cafés, and chic retail outlets.

• The Nobu Hotel and Residences, slated to open on the Herzliya Marina in June 2010, combines luxury hospitality with a fine sushi restaurant in a New Age Japanese Art Deco style. The property is a partnership between chef Nobu Matsuhisa and actor Robert De Niro.

• Tel Aviv's luxurious Hotel Montefiore is an oasis of style and service in a meticulously restored, 1920s heritage building that houses 12 elegant rooms, plus a hip restaurant and bar.

Kosher Cruise Down Under: Uniworld Travel & Tours of Toronto, in association with kosher cruise specialists Eddie's Travel of Israel, presents the first deluxe kosher cruise of Australia and New Zealand. Travel dates are Feb. 2 to 16, 2009.

Tourism in Israel is still on an upswing.

Israel & the Jewish World

Report urges Israel to clean up waterways

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Mayim Mayim is a Hebrew folksong that celebrates the joys of finding fresh water in the arid Israeli landscape. It would stand to reason that with that appreciation of sweet water, Israelis would conserve and protect their water resources.

Not so, states a recently released report by the Israeli environmental group Zalul. Zalul's 2008 State of the Sea Report claims Israeli corporations and municipalities are abusing the country's water supply, depleting it or simply dumping chemical and biological contaminants that find their way into the country's waterways and the Mediterranean.

"Each year over 50 million cubic metres of industrial effluents and sewage are dumped into the coastal waters of Israel by special permit of the Inter-ministerial Committee for Issuance of Discharge Permits without any discharge fee," states the report. "This amount does not include municipal sewage from treatment plants. Actual total effluent and sewage discharges are estimated at over 100 million cubic metres."

The organization calls on the government to impose discharge fees on polluters comparable to other countries, said Sagit Rogenstein, Zalul's deputy director.

"Millions of shekels stay in the hands of corporations rather than towards the application of best available technologies or a government fund for protecting the environment. Issuing permits without demanding any discharge fee results in marine pollution and lack of advanced treatment technologies," the report states.

"Market failure hurts both the national treasury...and the public health." The report calculates, based on a treatment fee of 4 to 16.75 shekels per cubic metre, the government could collect discharge fees in the range of 200 million to 900 million shekels.

Those fees would represent a small portion of Israeli companies' annual profits (1.3 per cent to 5.4 per cent) and should be used by government "to create a fund to protect and improve the coastal environment," the report states.

Rogenstein said a couple of high profile cases have brought the sad state of Israel's waterways to public attention and blackened the country's reputation.

At the 1997 Maccabiah Games, a bridge collapse over the Yarkon River claimed the lives of four Australian athletes and sickened many others. The river's noxious pollution was highlighted by the tragedy, she said.

"In the last couple of years, Acre has been most affected [by pollution]," she continued. The historic town, north of Haifa, is at the mouth of the Kishon River, which carries sewage downriver from Karmiel. Acre Bay has become so polluted that beaches in the area have been closed for most of the past two summers.

Israeli Navy Seals training in the bay have been found to suffer unusually high levels of cancer, even though most contract it in their early 40s.

Since the Maccabiah tragedy, the condition of the Yarkon has improved, Rogenstein said. "It's amazing what international embarassment can do. The government got on top of that and the pollution stopped," she said. "I wouldn't swim in it, but the river is slowly getting rehabilitated."

Israel has a responsibility as a good Mediterranean neighbour to reduce discharge into the sea. A UN survey found the Dan (central Israel) sewage treatment facility is the sixth largest single polluter of the Mediterranean, Rogenstein said.

Compounding Israel's pollution problems is the dire situation facing the country's water supply. "The water situation in Israel is bad," she said. This past summer, public service messages were aired to encourage water conservation because the Kinneret (the northern lake that provides the bulk of the country's fresh water) was at a dangerously low level.

Drinking water, in short supply, is being pumped for industrial use, she said. With fees attached to pollution, "that would give [polluters] the incentive to treat their water at a higher level."

Israelis are becoming more environmentally aware as they travel abroad and see other countries use their waterways for recreation and pleasure. "It is reaching the top of the national agenda as time goes on," she said.

Zalul was founded in 1999 and is one of Israel's leading environmental NGOs that is dedicated to protecting the seas and rivers of Israel.

Travel Briefs

• The Blue and White Pages, which document the history of Israel, highlight milestones in Israel's rich and storied history in more than 100 rarely seen original documents, including the diary of Israeli astronaut Ilan Ramon, which miraculously survived the Columbia space shuttle disaster of 2003. At the Israel Museum in Jerusalem thru February 2009.

• New York's Metropolitan Museum of Art is exhibiting a dazzling gold-glass table from Caesarea in its Byzantine galleries. Dating to the late sixth or early seventh century CE, the table was excavated in a Byzantine period mansion in Caesarea, where it was discovered with its face down on a mosaic floor, buried in ashes and debris. Also at the Met, in the Ancient Near Eastern Art Galleries, are several Chalcolithic Period (roughly around 4000 BCE) objects from Israel.

• Traces of Sepharad, a series of etchings of Judeo-Spanish proverbs by Marc Shanker, offers a unique window into Sephardi culture and thinking. The exhibit opens Nov. 10 and continues through February 2009 at the Center for Jewish History, 15 West 16th St., New York City.

• Short Long Journey is a museum and website exhibit that tells the story of a small Jewish community in Slovakia, in the Partizanska (previously Nemecka) Lupca municipality. The multimedia project documents the experiences of the family of Vojtech Gal, who was shot by a Nazi murderer in 1945 during the death march from Sachsenhausen to Schwerin; the group camp in Sered and Terezin are also covered. www. kratkadlouhacesta.cz

Beth Tzedec beats rival to retain baseball title

By DAVID EISENSTADT
Special to The CJN

Two for two.

That's the Beth Tzedec "Boys of October" record in back-to-back seasons after defeating a team from Beth Sholom synagogue 32-13 to win the 2008 Inter Synagogue Baseball League (ISBL) title. Beth Sholom finished first in regular season play, losing only two games.

For the second year in a row, Beth Tzedec, under team captain Noah Mintz, came through in a big way, despite struggling early in the season. The team won its final three regular season games to finish fifth in the 11-team league.

Steaming ahead, Beth Tzedec dispatched a powerful Junction Shul team two games to none in the quarter-finals, allowing fewer than four runs per game. Beth Tzedec then defeated second place Temple Emanu-El 17-15 in a do-or-die semifinal contest.

The rematch of the 2007 title game with Beth Sholom saw the defending champs – who ended a 20-year drought last season – jump to a 5-0 start as Randy Flom singled home two and son Mike Flom followed with an inside-the-park homer.

After giving up two runs to Beth Sholom, the hit parade continued with consecutive hits from Bill Greisman, Robbie Schachter and David Eisenstadt, who combined for 11 hits on the day. Dan Rethazy hit a bases-clearing triple, but not before Beth Sholom scored five runs to narrow the gap.

Dave Mann, Mike Yermus, Daniel Berholz and Noah Mintz combined to go 17 for 19, each homering for the third straight playoff game. Prior commitments kept stalwarts Adam Dean, Allan Eckhaus and Jonathan Freeman from playing in the final game.

Holy Blossom Temple took the consolation championship on total runs scored despite being defeated by a team from Adath Israel Congregation in their final game.

Defensive slip costs Israel in World Cup qualification

By MOSHE BOKER
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Israel men's team last week had another disappointing game against a relatively weak opponent, drawing with Latvia 1-1 in a game they let slip away in the 89th minute. The tie leaves them in second place in European Group 2 World Cup qualification.

Yossi Benayoun scored a beautiful go-ahead goal in the 50th minute, but that seemed to deflate the Israelis as coach Dror Kashtan saw his team lose its fight leading to an 89th minute equalizer by Latvia's Vladimirs Kolesnicenko.

Switzerland's upset of Greece throws Group 2 wide open. While Israel now has a chance to win the group, it could also slide behind Switzerland and completely fade from the World Cup picture. The 2010 FIFA World Cup will be held in South Africa.

"One time you score the equalizer in the 90th minute, and another time you concede a goal in the 90th minute," Kashtan said after the game. "That's soccer."

According to Kashtan, "We controlled the pace of the game, and they didn't get scoring opportunities."

He blamed the miscue on the defence. "We should have kicked the ball forward and not backward," he said. Kashtan explained he had tried to strengthen the team's control on the ball with a late substitution and Benayoun at midfield, adding that "we had the game in hand," but "errors are part of the game."

Benayoun expressed extreme frustration after the game. He said the team worked well and was close to victory. "Two centimetres were the difference between a 2-0 lead and an equalizer," he said, referring to a shot in the 82nd minute by Yaniv Barda that hit the Latvian goalpost. He said that not even the Latvians believed they could score and their goal was very disappointing, considering the hosts hadn't been close to scoring all evening.

"We should have cleared the balls to the offence," he added, "to play the lines, and that was our mistake. And you pay for mistakes."

In four World Cup qualifiers, Israel has two wins and two draws for eight points. Greece leads the group with three wins and one loss, good for nine points. Switzerland is next with two wins, one loss and one draw for seven points. Others in Group 2 include Latvia, Luxembourg and Moldova.

Taking aliyah too far

By YONI GOLDSTEIN

One of the greatest achievements of the State of Israel is its long-standing policy of helping Jews in distress around the world. This custom places Israel among the elite nations that have an acute concern for the well-being of humanity, and, in perhaps the most significant way, emphasizes that Jews everywhere have a welcoming home to which they can return whenever they want to and for whatever reason.

Consider the history:

- Hundreds of thousands of European Jews fled to Palestine before, during and after the Holocaust.
- Operation Moses brought 8,000 starving Ethiopian Jews to Israel in 1984.
- Operation Solomon, the far more dangerous and significant followup to Operation Moses in 1991, saved nearly 15,000 Ethiopian Jews from the fallout of ever-worsening political turmoil in that country.
- About 1.2 million Russian Jews now live in Israel. As many as 90 per cent of them made aliyah during the 1980s and 1990s.

The trend continues to this day, albeit in a different form. Since 2005, more than 6,000 African refugees have made the trek to Israel, usually crossing at the Egyptian border. Many of these new arrivals come from war-torn Sudan, and while they are mostly not of Jewish heritage – and, therefore, are not eligible for citizenship under the Law of Return – the Israeli government has been welcoming.

We have been hearing for some time that the major part of the Diaspora reclamation project, so to speak, is now finished. While it's true that virtually all of the Jews in danger in Ethiopia and the former Soviet Union have been brought to Israel, history tells us that Jews will again, perhaps sooner rather than later, become endangered in their home countries. When this happens, there is no doubt that Israel will be first to lend a helping hand.

But the great zeal to save Jews in peril can be taken too far.

Recently I came across a pamphlet produced by an organization called Yad L'achim. The headline of the leaflet read: "Hundreds of Children like Ahmed Ben Sarah Can Be Learning in Jewish Schools." A blurb below sets out Yad L'achim's creed — to "help" Jewish women who have married Arabs to return to Jewish life.

The brochure continues: "[These children] have been raised in Arab villages, cut off from their heritage. Their mothers, who realize they made the mistake of their lives getting involved with Arab men, are trapped in abusive marriages." Then, Yad L'achim explains how it plans to fix this situation: A "specially trained Yad L'achim team" goes into Arab villages, takes the women and children, provides finances so that the women can fight for custody of the children and, finally, helps to "bring them back to the Jewish people."

As what might be considered a radical kiruv organization, Yad L'achim is doing the sort of work that aliyah proponents must be wary of. This project's generalizing statement — that Jewish women married to Arab men are unhappy with their circumstances or are the victims of abuse — isn't backed by any wide-scale evidence. One wonders whether it is the women or Yad L'achim who believe they have made "the mistake of their lives" by marrying non-Jews.

The ideal of reclaiming Jewish people in distress is the greatest lesson Israel has given to the world. But there is a real danger of degrading the purity of the aliyah project. Yad L'achim's program expresses an agenda that's more concerned with achieving a dangerously partisan goal than helping Jews in distress. It shouldn't hide beneath the umbrella of aliyah.

DARK GINGERBREAD PEAR CAKE

- 1 1/2 c flour
- 1/2 tsp cinnamon
- 1/4 tsp salt
- 1/4 c water
- 1/2 c regular molasses
- 1/4 c grated peeled ginger
- 1 tsp baking soda
- 1/8 tsp ground allspice
- 1 stick unsalted butter
- 1/2 c packed dark brown sugar
- 3 lg eggs
- 1 Bosc pear

Preheat oven to 350°F. Grease a 9" cake pan. Whisk together flour, baking soda, cinnamon, allspice, and salt. In a saucepan, melt butter with water. In food processor, beat together brown sugar and molasses until combined. Add eggs 1 at a time, beating well. Beat in flour mixture at low speed until just combined. Add butter mixture and ginger, beating just until smooth. Pour into cake pan. Peel pear; cut into ¼" pieces. Scatter over batter. Bake about 35 min. or until testing toothpick comes out clean. Cool.

REMEMBERING OUR YESTERDAYS

By BILL GLADSTONE

From church to synagogue to theatre

This rare photograph (circa 1907) shows the former church on Elm Street at University Avenue that housed the historic Goel Tzedec Congregation from 1884 until its move into the grand University Avenue Synagogue in 1907. The building then served as the city's first Yiddish theatre, but closed a year later after a calamitous balcony collapse. Goel Tzedec and a sister congregation, Beth Hamidrash Hagadol of McCaul Street, amalgamated in the early 1950s and moved uptown as the present Beth Tzedec Congregation.

Some ways to make your diet healthier

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. Is buttermilk high in fat? I see a lot of seemingly healthy recipes calling for it?

A. Actually, buttermilk is quite low in fat, although many people are misled because of the name. But buttermilk is the milk left over when butter is made and the fat has been mostly removed. One cup of buttermilk contains approximately 100 calories and only 2 grams of fat, making it similar to 1 per cent milk in fat and calories.

Buttermilk is a popular and great ingredient in muffins and other dishes because of its rich flavour and texture, especially since it is a low-fat choice. A useful tip is that in any recipe calling for full fat ingredients like butter, oil, etc., you can substitute an equal amount of buttermilk, yogurt or applesauce. This is particularly effective in muffins, cakes and quick breads such as banana bread. It will, however, change the texture of cookies significantly.

If you have a recipe calling for buttermilk and do not have any, most cookbooks will tell you how to "sour" regular milk to use in its place by adding some vinegar or lemon juice.

Q. I have noticed the new health check symbol on many products. What does that mean?

A. The health check symbol, a new designation showing up on many products, was developed by the Heart and Stroke Foundation to show consumers which products comply with their standards for foods that offer a healthier choice.

The way this works is that companies can apply to use this label. If a product is approved based on the criteria set out by the Heart and Stroke Foundation for the program, the company can pay a fee and then use the health check symbol on that product. Foods bearing the symbol typically contain less fat, salt, trans fat, etc., than similar products.

If you would like to see the specific criteria, you can visit the foundation's website at http://www.heartandstroke.com.

It's important to note that you still have to consider your own health and personal nutritional goals to see if these foods are appropriate for inclusion in your particular diet, but this is another step toward having more healthful products on Canadian shelves.

Israel headed for elections

JTA

JERUSALEM — Prime minister-designate Tzipi Livni has called for new general elections in Israel, saying she failed to form a coalition government.

Livni, currently foreign minister, won the Kadima party primary in September following Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's resignation. But she was unable to assemble a governing majority, and on Sunday said she would not ask Israeli President Shimon Peres for more time to bring coalition partners on board.

Livni had managed to bring the Labor party, led by Defence Minister Ehud Barak, on board, but she failed to reach an agreement with the Orthodox Shas party or other potential coalition partners, to pass the 61-seat threshold necessary to become prime minister.

Livni made her decision late Saturday night during a party meeting that included her main Kadima rival, Transportation Minister Shaul Mofaz. The meeting was called after Shas and Degel Hatorah, another Orthodox party, said they would not join Livni's government. The Pensioners party also announced Saturday night that it was backing out of negotiations with Livni.

"After the primaries, I said that I believed in stability and was committed to seeing through the process of forming a government," Livni told the cabinet meeting on Sunday. "Recent days have seen coalition demands become impossible, and there was a need to draw the line, to say, 'No more.'

Israel's prime minister-designate Tzipi Livni advised a meeting of the Kadima party on Monday that she saw no choice but to seek new elections. [Yossi Zamir/Flash90 photo]

"I was prepared to pass budgets I believe in for needy families and social causes, but when it became clear that every person and every party was taking advantage of the situation to make illegitimate demands – both economic and diplomatic – I decided to put a stop to it and go to elections."

Peres had three days to ask another lawmaker to try to form a new government within 28 days, but on Monday, he announced that would declare new elections at the opening of the Knesset winter session later that day.

The elections will likely be held in February or March. Until then, Olmert will stay on as caretaker prime minister.

Iran admits arming terror groups

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A top Iranian Revolutionary Guards commander has said Iran is supplying weapons to liberation armies in the Middle East, a state-run news agency reported.

It was the first official confirmation that the country provides weapons to armed groups in the region.

Gen. Hossein Hamedani, deputy commander of a volunteer militia that is part of the elite Revolutionary Guards, did not provide specific details. But Iran is widely believed to provide weapons to Lebanon's militant Shiite Hezbollah group. The U.S. military has also accused Iran of arming Shiite militias in Iraq.

"Not only are our armed forces self-sufficient, liberation armies of the region get part of their weapons from us," Borna news quoted Hamedani as saying on its website late Sunday.

In the past, Iran – a majority Shiite country – has denied arming Hezbollah, saying it only provided political and financial support. The Iranian government has also denied providing weapons or financial support to Shiite militants fighting U.S. forces in Iraq.

But the U.S. military has said it has evidence that elements of the Mahdi army, an Iraqi militia loyal to anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, have been armed by Iran.

Hamedani also said Iran has no shortage of advanced missile systems.

Adath Israel cantor retires after 42 years

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

On the weekend of Nov. 1 and 2, Adath Israel Congregation, along with friends and cantorial colleagues, will pay tribute to Cantor A. Eliezer Kirshblum, chazzan, educator and community leader, on his retirement after 42 years with the congregation.

Kirshblum is believed to be the longest-serving cantor in Canada.

At a special Shabbat service, the Aron Kodesh in the shul's main sanctuary will be dedicated to Kirshblum. Davening will be led by guest Cantor Paul Kowarsky, and the synagogue's professional choir will be conducted by Charles Heller.

"The congregation is inaugurating the Cantor A. Eliezer Kirshblum Endowment Fund," said Samuel Cohen, who is co-chairing the tribute with Ronald Appleby.

"This fund will enhance our congregation in ways close to Cantor Kirshblum's heart, providing meaningful additional support and programming for youth and young families, education, music and other congregational purposes," Cohen said.

Cantor Kirshblum

"We know that the Aron Kodesh and the endowment fund will provide meaningful legacies of Eli's magnificent lifetime contribution to our congregation," he added.

"Cantor Kirshblum is not your everyday chazzan. He is a model of what a chazzan should be – he's a community leader, an educator, a volunteer and a fun guy who is everybody's friend."

On Sunday, Nov. 2, at 7:30 p.m., the Toronto Council of Hazzanim will present a musical tribute to Kirshblum at the synagogue, featuring 18 cantors from Israel, the United States and Toronto – from Orthodox, Conservative and Reform congregations.

Proceeds will go to Akim Israel, Chai Tikvah Foundation, Zareinu and the Toronto Cantorial Trust Fund.

Kirshblum served four terms as the president of the Toronto Council of Hazzanim and spearheaded educational seminars and concerts that raised funds for a variety of charities and institutions.

Born in Brooklyn, N.Y., Kirshblum graduated from Yeshiva University. After spending a year in Israel, he attended YU's Ferkauf Graduate School of Education and earned a master's of science.

At the same time, he studied chazzanut with renowned Cantor David Koussevitzky.

In 1967, Kirshblum and his family moved to Toronto, where he became the cantor of Adath Israel.

Shortly thereafter, he organized a professional choir and a children's choir.

He has also motivated a number of choir members to undertake cantorial training. Some became professional cantors and serve in congregations throughout North America.

"The children's choirs has produced our daveners as well as motivated so many to pursue careers in rabbinate, cantorate, education, etc.," Kirshblum said.

"Many of these children , after growing up, join our congregation with an appreciation of chazzanut, choral music, Jewish liturgy and nusach."

His cantorial colleagues are full of praise for Kirshblum.

"Cantor Kirshblum has devoted his life's work to 'cantorial art' and to the Toronto Council of Hazzanim," said Cantor Eric Moses of Beth Sholom Synagogue.

"On a personal note," he added, "I attribute my becoming a cantor to his guidance and support."

With his interest in education, in 1973, Kirshblum became the educational director of his synagogue's supplementary religious school. Twelve years ago, he organized the Community Hebrew High School, which serves the entire community.

Kirshblum also helped found and serves as chair of the Toronto Council of Hazzanim's trust fund. As well, he serves on numerous boards and committees of many community institutions.

The other Rabbi Lau leads an Orthodox 'evolution'

Spiritual leader to address Torah in Motion conference

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Benjamin (Benny) Lau, a leading voice of modern Orthodoxy in Israel, believes in "evolution, not revolution."

When it comes to human rights, women's rights, treatment of animals and other issues not necessarily considered in the religious realm, Rabbi Lau – the 47-year-old director of the Center for Judaism and Society as well as the Institute for Social Justice, which he founded at Beit Morasha of Jerusalem – is at the forefront precisely because of his religious convictions, he said in a phone interview from Israel.

"It's a big mistake in the Jewish world when rabbis feel their business is [only] the relationship between man and God," he said. "It's completely wrong. It's a Jewish statement that to be a religious Jew means to care about your community and your state. We read the newspapers to see the real needs, and ask ourselves what the Torah has to say about them."

"The Orthodox world can bring to the world new ideas, and they don't need to break the rules [of Jewish law] to find the solutions," Rabbi Lau said.

The rabbi – whose uncle, Rabbi Israel Meir Lau, was Ashkenazi chief rabbi of Israel from 1993 to 2003 – will be in Toronto on the weekend of Nov. 8 for Torah in Motion's seventh annual Renewing Our Spirit conference.

He will speak at three sessions, including the opening night panel titled "Is Jewish Unity a Myth? The Fragmentation of Orthodoxy in Israel and Beyond." He will also be speaking in Montreal on the evening of Nov. 9.

Although the term modern Orthodoxy is used more often in a Diaspora context, Rabbi Lau typifies its philosophy.

"Modernity in the western world means I want to be part of human rights. I want to be in a position of democratic ideas, tolerance and pluralism. I am part of that, and at the same time I am Orthodox. It means I [accept] the law of the Jewish people… I don't want to cut this line."

Rabbi Benjamin Lau

Rabbi Lau said he is not the only Orthodox rabbi in Israel who believes that "we have to be part of modernity."

An article in Ha'aretz last year noted that Rabbi Lau was willing to form an alternative beit din for conversion to Judaism, which would be more user-friendly than the existing ones that are controlled by haredi rabbis.

"Officially, steps have not been taken yet, but we are working very hard," he told The CJN.

Regarding the current system, he said that "the ultra-Orthodox world put themselves in a very aggressive way against people who convert who are not 100 per cent religious. We saw that the religious high courts… closed the gates to thousands of people, most who come from Russia."

Those olim, who identify as Jewish and made aliyah under the law of return, are not Jewish according to Jewish law because their mothers are not Jewish, he explained.

Rabbi Lau has said publicly that his uncle, as chief rabbi, "excelled in inaction in the conversion field." Explaining that quote, which also appeared in the Ha'aretz article,

Where timeless meets present

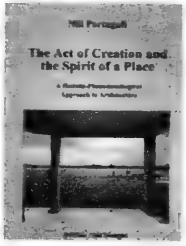
From the editor's desk

If anyone could understand that each place on earth has an intrinsically unique character worthy of respect, but that some places have an especially compelling aspect to that character, it would surely be someone whose family has been from Tsfat (Safed) for seven generations.

Tsfat, the enchanting city of mystic lore nestled in the high hills and sylvan steppes of northern Galilee, is one of the four sacred cities of Israel.

And although she lives in Tel Aviv today, the memories of holidays, synagogues, alleyways, colours and stories of Isaac Luria, Joseph Caro, Moshe Cordovero, Haim Vital and their secret wisdom-seeking cadre of teachers and students have so informed Nili Portugali's personality that they have led her to believe in certain universal axioms about the power of place.

Portugali has been an architect in Israel for more than 30 years and a lecturer in the department of architecture at the Bezalel Academy of Art and Design in Jerusalem. She studied architecture at the Technion Institute in Haifa, at the Architectural Association School of Architecture in London and at the Centre for Environmental Studies in Berkeley, Calif.



Portugali was in Toronto last week on her way to Ottawa to speak at the Azrieli School of Architecture and Urbanism at Carleton University, and then on to the United States.

She met with The CJN at a midtown coffee shop to talk about her work, the philosophy that instructs, if not actually infuses, it and the book she recently wrote that expounds on both.

Portugali speaks with urgency and passion about her beliefs.

"My great-grandfather painted the lions on the Aron Kodesh, the Holy Ark, in the synagogue of the ARI, Isaac Luria.

"Intuitively, even as a youngster, I grasped the city of Safed. But if I look at that phenomenon today as a scientist, I see it [grasping or being moved by the city] more clearly.

"In younger days, one doesn't know or understand how or even why to connect to the many layers of memory, interest and experience that become the essence of a place. But later in life, the pieces start to fit together."

With her enthusiasm rising above the level of the other conversations in the room, Portugali elaborates. "I am talking about bringing together the recurring patterns, universal codes [as she calls them] to be in harmony with the context of a place: its history, culture, geography, geology, materials and broad nature of a site."

Portugali is aware that she uses terminology and describes concepts that can be associated with the quasi-philosophies of the modern age.

"I do not want to sound New Age," she emphasizes. "I simply want to make the point that architecture is for human beings and that there are absolute truths in architecture that can be applied to make the place – the space and the environment – the best it can be for human beings."

Portugali's portfolio is varied. It includes public buildings, residential and mixed developments, master plans and private houses.

The thread that ties and unifies all of her work is the belief that "beyond the need to achieve beauty, comfort and harmony, there is a truth that underlies the experience of a place that touches us emotionally.

"I always thought that attractions [to a place or a structure or a locale] were subjective, but as I saw how people from all over the world, from different cultures and life experiences, reacted in similar ways to those spaces, I understood that there must be something more here than a personal attraction.

"There is a timeless aspect to all such places that compels us to return again and again. Something in them – codes, innate patterns of space, of the structures of the mind – touch us emotionally. They create a spirit of the place."

She emphasized again that she did not mean any New Age references.

"I try to respect the spirit of the place in a holistic way, which means simply to be aware of the environment of the entire space."

This is the message Portugali imparts very elaborately and very effectively in The Act of Creation and the Spirit of a Place (Edition Axel Menges, 2006; Stuttgart, London).

The book chronicles her personal affirmation that a building is more than a collection of discrete design fragments. It chronicles her lifelong efforts "at creating a meaningful dialogue between a contemporary building [or function] and the entirety of the context of the place of that building."

One need not be a student of architecture to grasp that the essence of Portugali's approach and philosophy can be applied to all realms of life: the place (broadly defined) in which we stand should influence if not actually determine how we stand.

Whether we stand and, of course, why we stand, must be answered first. –MBD

MADRID TALKS SET PRECEDENT

In the aftermath of the fall of the Iron Curtain and the end of the Gulf War, the government of Spain hosted a conference dedicated to the peaceful resolution of the Middle East conflict. The three-day meeting convened in Madrid on Oct. 30, 1991. Direct bilateral talks began between Israel and Syria, Lebanon and Jordan. The Palestinians were part of the Jordanian delegation. Multilateral negotiations were launched on arms control, security, water, refugees, the environment and economic development. The conference was precedent-setting, in that Arab states met with Israel and agreed to enter direct talks with the Jewish state. Web hate report released by FSWC

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center (FSWC) last week honoured Toronto Police chief Bill Blair and York Region chief Armand La Barge for their efforts in promoting tolerance.

In a ceremony at the Center's North York offices, the two chiefs were lauded for enforcing hate-crime laws and in promoting officer sensitivity training.

At the same time, the FSWC released its latest report, Digital Terrorism & Hate 2.0, an interactive CD that identifies 8,000 online sources of hate and terrorism. That represents a 30 per cent increase over 2007.

"Chief La Barge and Chief Blair demonstrate determination and a commitment to reduce hate crimes, promoting community education about the consequences hate campaigns can have on the lives of innocent people in Toronto and the GTA," said Avi Benlolo, president and CEO of the FSWC.

"We honour them for promoting tolerance and human rights at a time when Internet hate appears to be on the rise in Canada and beyond."

Fifteen years ago, the Center identified only one site that could be characterized as promoting hate. Since then, the number of such sites has exploded, and many web locations now offer recruitment and instruction in terrorism, said Leo Adler, director of national affairs for the FSWC.

An estimated 1.3 billion people have access to the Internet, but it only takes one person to "cause havoc, death and destruction" by learning how to commit terrorist acts from the web, Adler said.

Pointing to the 1995 Oklahoma City bombing – America's worst case of domestic terrorism – Adler noted that the same bomb-making formula used in that attack was available on the web and that domestic terrorism suspects were planning to employ that same type of bomb in Toronto, though three times more powerful.

"For all its good, [the Internet] has the potential for evil as well" and terrorists need not rely on large numbers to have a tremendous impact, he said.

In its report – Online Terror + Hate: The First Decade, released with the CD, the FSWC proposed a 10-point action plan addressed to families and online users to identify and curb the dangers posed by Internet terrorism and hate.

Parents are urged to stress that "hate is never cool," even if it's on the web. Children must also be warned about online postings that seem educational but that vilify religions and groups. Parents must actively take an interest in what their children are viewing on the web and not treat the Internet as a babysitting service, the ireport suggests.

Cartoons and games may not be as innocent as they appear, Adler suggested. There are online games that allow the user to shoot blacks or Mexicans crossing the U.S. border, while others are homophobic or glorify the Columbine shooting.

Few of the problematic sites are located in Canada. "We have been very successful bringing these sites to their [Canadian Internet service providers] attention, and very often they remove them," Adler said.

Sites hosted in the United States and other countries, however, are readily available in Canada, he added.

The Internet is increasingly being used "as a propaganda and recruitment tool of major hate groups worldwide, such as Hamas, KKK, Al Qaeda and various neo-Nazi groups," FSWC said in a release.

In an interview with The CJN, La Barge said there were "no instances" in York Region of such recruitment by either Hamas or Al Qaeda. York Region police co-operate with RCMP, CSIS and other law enforcement agencies to investigate extremist groups.

"Islamic terrorist groups are being investigated and other terrorist groups," La Barge stated.

Blair said the ideologies of Hamas and Al Qaeda are actively promoted on the Internet, and Toronto police "continue to monitor Internet activity" among some young people.

Benlolo said the CD and its companion ireport will be distributed to law enforcement officials, politicians, educators and journalists.

KIEVER SHUL HONOURED: On Oct. 19, Heritage Toronto presented the Kiever Shul with a plaque commemorating the Kensington Market synagogue's enduring presence in the community. The congregation, formally named the First Russian Congregation of Rodfei Sholem Anshei Kiev, began meeting in 1912 in "The Ward," an area east of University Avenue and south of College Street. In 1917, the shul relocated to its current site at 25 Bellevue Ave. It's one of the last remaining synagogues in Kensington Market. Impious over Pius XII

The delicate and disturbing possibility of the canonization of Pope Pius XII has been much in the news lately. Recently, a Vatican official suggested that a planned visit to Israel by Pope Benedict could be delayed, if not cancelled, due to the offence caused the Catholic Church by a caption accompanying a photograph of Pius in a display at Yad Vashem. The caption claims that Pius "abstained from signing the Allied declaration condemning the extermination of the Jews" and "maintained his neutral position throughout the war."

The implied threat in the official's statement was denied by other officials in the Vatican. But the utterance understandably roiled Israeli sensibilities. President Shimon Peres intervened to try to still the heaving waters of Israeli-Vatican relations by urging the Vatican not to let the photo caption impinge on the proposed visit.

But the possibility of Pius' elevation remains a sore point between the Vatican, Israel and Jews around the world. At a commemoration on Oct. 9 of the 50th anniversary of Pius' death, Pope Benedict said he prayed the process that could lead to Pius' beatification "can proceed happily." Four days earlier, the chief rabbi of Haifa, Shear-Yashuv Cohen, told Benedict during a synod that Jews "cannot forgive and forget" that some major religious leaders at the time did not speak out against the Holocaust. Rabbi Cohen was the first Jew to address a synod.

Prompted by the public statements generated by renewed debate, leaders of the Jewish communities of Italy and France have also recently spoken out against the canonization of Pope Pius.

Even the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum last week urged the Vatican to delay the canonization of Pope Pius XII until it opens up its World War II archives for comprehensive inspection and study.

Angelo Pacelli – Pope Pius XII – was Rome's bishop, the highest Roman Catholic temporal and spiritual authority during World War II. To this very day, some historians ask why he failed to speak out publicly against the genocide being perpetrated all around him by the Nazis.

To that very doleful question the Vatican has never delivered a satisfactory reply. Pius was reluctant to speak out publicly, the Church has always said, because he feared the Nazis would take vengeance against it and its own worshippers. But, in any event, the Vatican adds, Pius did secretly save thousands of Jews. Pope Benedict has forcefully defended Pius, saying he "spared no effort" on behalf of Jews during World War II. The evidence however for these assertions has been flimsy, since the Vatican has not opened the entirety of its archives on the subject.

Whether the Vatican proceeds with the canonization of Pope Pius XII is for the Vatican to decide. But it should not delude itself into thinking that the merely internal Vatican decision would be without consequences externally. Until the entire truth of Pius' wartime record is shared, his elevation to saintly status would cause great pain to the Jews around the world and cast into doubt the bona fides of past overtures by the Church to the Jewish people.

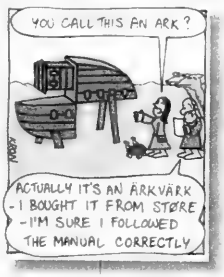
Rabbi Phyvle Rosensweig led Kitchener

The article "Kitchener shul celebrates centennial" (CJN, Oct. 16) mentioned Rabbi Yosel Rosenzweig, the spiritual leader of Congregation Beth Jacob, but it failed to mention the late Rabbi Phyvle Rosensweig (no relation to our current rabbi) who was our rabbi for 36 of the shul's 100 years. He and his wife, Gittel, who taught in our Talmud Torah for most of those 36 years, were instrumental in forging our success as a synagogue and as a community.



Rabbi Phyvle Rosensweig came to Kitchener as a young man of 26 and almost immediately directed Beth Jacob on the path of Jewish learning and ritual. I, as well as others, have committed ourselves to the longevity of Beth Jacob mostly because of him.

Claims conference and survivors

While watching two Israeli documentaries, Paying for Justice and its sequel, The Struggle Continues ("Films expose the problem of impoverished Holocaust survivors in Israel," CJN, Oct. 16), I wondered how many of the Claims Conference dignitaries in the documentaries had actually talked to the survivors – the subject of their gathering. Sitting around the breakfast table in the five-star Sheraton Hotel in Tel Aviv, they greeted the wounded cries of the needy survivors with stony faces. In response to them, one dignitary thrust his hand into his pocket and retrieved a few denominations in a cynically bravado gesture to presumably show that he, too, was poor.

I know many of these conferees who were nibbling croissant, and I've known some of my supplicating fellow survivors. They have lived worlds apart. Three years after they made it out from the concentration camps and the woods, the survivors fought in the Israeli War of Independence and took part in the building of the country. Unlike them, many of the Sheraton conferees vicariously experienced the travails and pains of Israel's birth and growth. Consequently, when they see a shooting star against the blue Israeli skies, they run for shelter, taking it for an enemy missile.

Watching these films hurt my Jewishness, and it shamed my humanity.

TJFF screened controversial films

Sidney Zoltak is correct when he states that both his committee, the Canadian Jewish Holocaust Survivors Committee, and the Canadian Jewish Congress wrote to the Toronto Jewish Film Festival (TJFF) and the board of the festival with their concerns about our screening of the film Paying for Justice and its sequel, The Struggle Continues ("Claims conference wrongly depicted," CJN letters, Oct. 23).

The festival and its board read the letters – both of the letters seemed, by their letterhead, to emanate from Congress – and we decided to go ahead with the screening. A court of law in Israel will be the one to determine the accuracy of the allegations made in the films.To the best of our memory, Sidney Zoltak did not ask for a response.

What he failed to mention, however, was that at least two members of his own committee were fundamentally opposed to the position taken in the letter. These members felt that to not show the film would be insulting to survivors. He also failed to mention that Congress has a local member on the Claims Conference Allocations Committee, which precludes them from having independent opinions on the issues raised.

Let me further state that they were invited to participate in an open forum discussion with the filmmakers and a moderator, but declined.

Survivors should see films

I am a member of the Canadian Jewish Holocaust Survivors Committee. For the sake of accuracy, mine was a dissenting voice in the issue of a letter sent by the committee, asking the Toronto Jewish Film Festival not to show the film Paying for Justice and its sequel, The Struggle Continues. ("Claims conference wrongly depicted," CJN letters, Oct. 23).

I haven't yet seen the films, but having recently read the report about the present findings of an Israeli state investigative committee on the plight of the aged, poor and poorest Holocaust survivors living in Israel versus the application of monies received (or not) from the Israeli representatives on the Claims Conference, I, as a an 80-year-old survivor of three camps, feel a strong solidarity with the survivors' case, as does the investigative committee in Israel, because to be silent is to be complicit.

In light of the foregoing, I was of the opinion that the survivor community here in Toronto should have the same fundamental right as that of those living in Israel to see these films and make up their own minds or debate it as vigorously as they wish, pro or con, in an open forum. Isn't this what our Canadian democracy is or ought to be about?

Israel eyes regional peace push, U.S. talks with Iran

By LESLIE SUSSER
JTA

With the governments in Washington and Jerusalem set to change, Israeli leaders are reassessing policy in two key areas: Middle East peacemaking and Iran.

On peacemaking, both President Shimon Peres and Defence Minister Ehud Barak are coming out strongly in favour of a new regional approach – and Prime Minister-designate Tzipi Livni is listening.

On Iran, the Foreign Ministry – the government department Livni heads – is preparing for the possibility of U.S. dialogue with Tehran, especially if Barack Obama becomes president. If that is the turn U.S. policy takes, Israel will try to convince the new U.S. president to insist on one condition: that Iran suspend uranium enrichment before talks begin.

For some time now, Peres has been arguing that it was a mistake for Israel to conduct separate negotiations for separate deals with the Syrians and the Palestinians. Instead, he says, Israel should be negotiating with all the Arab states and the Arab League for a comprehensive regional peace.

In separate negotiations, Israel often makes major concessions in return for relatively little, Peres says. For example, Israel's opening of peace talks with Syria already has resulted in the rehabilitation of the Syrian regime in the international arena, but Israel has received nothing in return.

But a regional approach could enable greater flexibility in solving problems and deliver a real end to the Arab-Israeli conflict, Peres says.

Behind the scenes, in meetings with Arab and western leaders, Peres quietly has been promoting the regional approach. Peres went public with this strategy only in his mid-September address to the UN General Assembly in New York, when he appealed directly to Saudi Arabia's King Abdullah by declaring that Israel was ready to discuss the 2002 Arab plan for regional peace.

In a meeting last week with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak in Sharm el-Sheik, Peres was expected to outline his ideas in more detail.

Although Peres serves in a ceremonial position – Israel's presidency comes with virtually no executive powers – the Israeli president's actions carry weight. This is partly because of Peres' reputation and experience, but more because his moves on the regional front have been co-ordinated closely with Livni.

Barak also has picked up this approach. He says Israel needs to come up with a regional peace initiative of its own and present it to the Arab world. The Arab and Israeli initiatives together then could create a basis for a serious regional peace dialogue.

He points out that Israeli and Arab moderates share concerns about containing Iran, Hezbollah and Hamas. And he agrees with Peres on the need for a more comprehensive regional approach, particularly since the separate talks with Syria and the Palestinians have made little headway.

The advantages of the regional approach are manifold: Israel could make trade-offs on and between key issues. It could bring countries such as Lebanon, Syria and Jordan into a solution of the Palestinian refugee issue. Israel would have the added assurance of knowing that any agreement would be underpinned by the entire Arab world. And the Jewish state could negotiate a credible end to the Arab-Israeli conflict precisely because the entire Arab world would be signed on to it.

But how would regional peacemaking actually work? Wouldn't the framework be too large and cumbersome? Wouldn't the more radical voices on the Arab side set the tone?

On the face of it, it would seem more logical for regional peace to follow agreements with Syria and the Palestinians, not produce them.

The way Israeli officials see it, regional talks could be held in parallel with negotiations with Syria and the Palestinians, not instead of them.

Photo opportunities, such as this, after each session of bilateral discussions between Israelis and Palestinians, may be increasingly a thing of the past if the future Israeli leadership prefers a regional rather than bilateral approach to peace talks. From left are Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and Palestinian negotiator Ahmad Queria. [RNS photo]

Whether or not the regional effort leaves the ground, the Foreign Ministry is considering other bilateral peace initiatives, including a long-term non-belligerency pact with Lebanon.

The thinking is that full peace with Lebanon will not be possible until there is peace with Syria, so why shouldn't Israel push for a more limited agreement on non-belligerency in the interim?

Israel is gearing up as well for a more conciliatory U.S. approach to Iran. Israeli strategists assume that whoever wins the U.S. election in November will seek to talk to Tehran, though Obama might do so without any preconditions.

For months, the Foreign Ministry, the Mossad, the National Security Council and the Israel Atomic Energy Commission have been discussing a range of possible Israeli responses.

The emergent consensus is that Israel will press the next U.S. president not to engage in open talks with Tehran until Iran suspends its uranium enrichment program. This is in line with a current proposal by the 5 Plus One powers – the United States, Russia, Great Britain, France and China, all permanent members of the UN Security Council, and Germany – that Iran stops the enriching process, receives a package of incentives for doing so and only then may talks start.

In any event, Livni seems quite willing to give dialogue a chance, as long as it is not used by the Iranians as a smokescreen to push ahead with their nuclear program.

Yitzhak Ben Yisrael, probably the Knesset member closest to Livni, says bluntly that if the world does not prevent Iran from going nuclear, Israel will have no choice but to take military action.

But, he says, Israel would much prefer that Iran be stopped by peaceful means, and he reckons there is still time. By his count, Iran is about three years away from producing a nuclear weapon: two years from fully mastering its uranium enrichment technology, and then another year from producing enough fissionable material to manufacture a bomb.

This seems to contradict a late September report to the cabinet by the head of research in military intelligence, Brig.-Gen. Yossi Baidatz. That report said that Iran was mastering enrichment technology, already had produced one-third of the fissionable material needed for a bomb and that the western world was blind to the urgency of the situation.

Despite Baidatz's alarm bells, Livni now seems to be ready to give fresh, focused diplomacy a chance. Talking to Iran while it continues to enrich uranium would, in her view, be a disaster. But getting Iran to suspend enrichment activities while talks are carried out could be the best way forward.

Non-aggression treaty with Lebanon?

JERUSALEM — The Foreign Ministry is examining an initiative aimed at reaching a long-term non-belligerence pact with Lebanon to prevent renewed fighting along the northern border.

The initiative was first revealed three weeks ago during a strategic discussion over the future of the Middle East peace process that was held as part of the ministry's evaluation of regional developments.

The evaluation is the first of its kind, and was initiated by ministry director-general Aharon Abramovich and later supported by Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni.

Livni's close advisers and senior ministry officials participated in the discussion. Given the officials' close relationship with Livni, the evaluation's recommendations are likely to turn into official policy should she succeed in forming a government.

Eran Etzion, the head of the Foreign Ministry's political planning section, said a full peace agreement with Lebanon can only come in the wake of a similar deal with Syria. Still, he said, Israel can try to advance on a separate political track with Lebanon, the end result of which could be a long-term non-belligerence pact.

The agreement would be signed by both governments, and its focus would be a reciprocal agreement on the route of the border between the two countries. The deal would include a solution to the dispute over the Shebaa Farms border area and the divided village of Ghajar, as well as a number of small border adjustments demanded by Lebanon.

The recommendation would provide for a co-ordination apparatus between the Israel Defence Forces and the Lebanese army, as well as the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon (UNIFIL) over border patrols and other monitoring activities.

Israel is expected to ask Lebanon to significantly reduce Hezbollah's weapons stores and to extend the Lebanese army's authority across the entire country, with a special emphasis on the area south of the Litani River, which is the closest area to Israel. In return, an agreement would have to be reached over Israeli overflights in Lebanese airspace.

The discussion also dealt with the Syrian and Palestinian diplomatic tracks, and officials present argued over which track should receive first priority.

Those in favour of dealing with Syria first agreed that the only tenable option on that track would involve negotiations over a final-status agreement with an Israeli withdrawal from the Golan Heights.

Supporters of this strategy said an agreement with Syria would be easier to reach than with the Palestinians, the chances for its success are greater and the strategic dividend Israel would receive is bigger. They also said such a deal would greatly change the balance of power in the region by removing the threat posed to Israel by the Syrian army, placing distance between Damascus and Iran and possibly engendering a deal with Lebanon.

Supporters of the "Palestinians first" strategy argued, however, that without solving the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, Jerusalem will be unable to advance peace talks with even a single moderate Arab state.

One official subscribing to this view said, "Every Arab person we talk to says the central issue that bothers him, and that they give priority to over everything else, is the Palestinian issue."

Junk food for the soul

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

Nike. Hermes. Pepsi. Versace. Starbucks. Mercedes. Armani.

You know these names, and so do millions of people worldwide. They are "brands," exclusive trademarks used by manufacturers. Brands are a multibillion dollar economic juggernaut that drives the global economy.

Brands may be great for business, but they're bad for the soul. They used to be about quality and style, and a good brand meant a reliable, high-quality product. (And a brand that lost its reputation was mocked – I remember when a certain car company was ridiculed by saying it's name stood for "Fix or repair daily"). But contemporary brands are more about image than quality. The logo on the front of a polo shirt is a substitute for personal identity.

It's usually wise to avoid judging a book by its cover (or as the Mishnah puts it, judging a wine by the bottle). But with brands, we're encouraged to believe that changing our cover will change our personality. Ads imply that a brand's image will become our own. If we drink Pepsi, we will "think young," and if we buy an Apple computer, we will "think different."

Nike sneakers proclaim that you are a proactive person who will "just do it," and true love requires a diamond, because "a diamond is forever." As Susan Fournier, a Harvard University business professor, put it: "People look at brands as carriers of symbolic language and forget that a brand's first purpose is to close the sale."

Brands are junk food for the soul. The search for identity is a powerful spiritual force that encourages people to live meaningful lives. Even when people have all their other needs met, they still need to create a spiritual identity.

As the prophet Amos says: "Behold, the days come, says the Lord, that I will send a famine in the land. Not a famine of bread, nor a thirst for water, but a hunger to hear the words of God."

But a store-bought brand identity substitutes ersatz meaning for spiritual depth.

The glamour of brands makes them far more attractive than old-fashioned spirituality. People contort themselves in order to buy a Porsche or a Rolex. Among young, upper-middle class couples, there is what I call a "baby versus BMW dilemma." Should they have another child and live more modestly, or should they have fewer kids in order to afford "the ultimate driving machine?" In a materialistic, brand-intoxicated culture, too many people choose BMWs over babies.

Like junk food, brands are a tasty little pleasure when enjoyed in moderation. But brands aren't a substitute for a healthy spiritual diet.

You can't fill your soul with fashionable but hollow designer vanity.

Unfortunately, too many people have sold their souls for a logo.

We should all turn toward Israel

Gil Troy in Montreal

Five times a year, Israelis witness a strange sight. As they return to work after the first and last day of Sukkot, the first and last day of Passover, and the Shavuot holiday, some visiting North American and European Jews still observe the strictures of the "chag," the holy day.

That these Diaspora Jews stick to their Galut – exile – practices in the Jewish homeland when even the most pious Israelis have ended the holiday is absurd. The holiness of Eretz Yisrael, the land of Israel, should prevail.

The bizarre practice of visitors to Israel observing the second days of holidays there highlights two disturbing trends. The Orthodox world suffers from a kind of autism about ritual, an inability to read subtle cues, to distinguish minor from major. More broadly, many Jews exhibit a condescending attitude toward Israel, forgetting Israel's primacy within Judaism.

For starters, accompanying Orthodoxy's welcome resurgence over the last few decades has been a disturbing stringency about far too many minutiae. Some – but not all – rabbis have lost their bearings. Some hector their congregants about the most picayune rules of kashrut while ignoring major sex scandals or other ethical lapses among congregants. Some gossips condemn neighbors in harsh, hateful and even violent terms for wearing dresses they might deem immodest by centimetres.

In fairness, the genius of Halachah, the Jewish system of law, lies in its focus on details. The strict attention to seemingly minor rituals has sustained Judaism through the millennia, preserving continuity, maintaining legitimacy and fostering an intensity in Jewish tradition. But focusing on details should enhance, not obscure, the major principles looming behind the minor acts. When ethical guidelines are ignored – or sacrificed – and when bigger principles are violated, ritual is distracting rather than reinforcing.

Rabbis must educate congregants about proportionality and intentionality. Maintaining the purpose behind the ritual is essential, and Jewish law should facilitate the broader quest to achieve a good, meaningful and ethical life. I once asked a rabbi what he thought about Orthodox Jews who observed the Sabbath obsessively yet acted in business immorally. He answered: "They are not Orthodox." This rabbi understood that if you can't pick and choose when it comes to rituals, you can't pick and choose when it comes to ethics, either.

Of course, visitors observing the second day of holidays in Israel are not obscuring any lapses, ethical or otherwise. Still, maintaining this particular ritual diminishes the Holy Land, thus undermining a major Jewish principle to adhere to a more minor ritual.

Alas, more and more Jews seem to forget Israel's primacy. Forgetting the blessings that flow from living in Israel, all too frequently, free, comfortable western Jews feel they are better off than their poor Israeli cousins. Too many fundraising appeals that caricature Israel as needy seemingly confirm this perception.

In truth, Orthodox Jews in the Diaspora face a major contradiction that most of them simply ignore. Despite devoting their lives to following every jot and tittle of Jewish law, they overlook the many mitzvot associated with living in the land of Israel. Before Israel became independent in 1948, Jews felt forced to remain in exile. Today, how can someone dedicated to following all of God's commandments as fully as possible justify choosing to live outside the Land of Israel?

I'm well aware of how explosive a charge this is, and how sensitive the aliyah issue is, so allow me to make a more modest proposal that will help restore some proportionality to the relationship. All Jews today should put the study of modern written and conversational Hebrew at the top of both communal and individual agendas. Studying modern Hebrew necessarily reorients people toward Israel, helping all Jews engage with Israel better.

And perhaps even more important for Diaspora Jews, putting Hebrew front and centre can prove humbling. Rather than demanding that our Israeli brothers and sisters speak to us in the particular language of our exile, we should make the effort – however trying – to speak the language of our people.

The great Zionist philosopher Achad Ha'am said that just as the Jews preserved the Sabbath, the Sabbath preserved the Jewish people. Similarly, let future historians note that just as the Jewish people preserved Hebrew, Hebrew preserved – and redeemed – the Jewish people today.

Distortions equate victims with perpetrators

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

Anyone partaking of the many moving, informative and profound programs mounted to mark Holocaust Education Week will find some recent developments in several areas of the former Soviet Union disturbing. While not quite Holocaust denial, the growing trend to "investigate" Holocaust survivors for crimes against humanity during World War II threatens to distort the way that the war is remembered in several of the regions where the Nazi genocide was perpetrated.

Some of you have followed the news in Lithuania, for example, where three Jewish former partisans have been under investigation. Their wartime resistance to Nazis, collaborators and the genocidal machinery has been construed as mass murder. This comes as part of an inquiry into an attack on the Lithuanian village of Kaniukai (formerly Koniuchy) in January 1944 by Soviet partisans who were acting on outdated information that German troops were being harboured there. Almost 40 villagers were killed during the battle that ensued, and contemporary Lithuania looks back on it as a massacre of innocent people by the Soviets, the equivalent to mass murders perpetrated by Nazis against Jews.

Like many countries with a complicated history during World War II, a history that may include both co-operation with Nazi persecution and the murder of Jews, and – simultaneously – victimization by Nazi or Soviet forces, contemporary Lithuania is engaged in a project to shape its history – that is, to shape the way it looks back at the past, and the role of its country and its inhabitants.

Lithuania has not made a strong effort to investigate and prosecute Nazi collaborators for war crimes. Its focus on what it construes as inhumane killings by Soviet partisans allows it to portray itself as doubly victimized during the war, rather than address its more complicated history.

Now, in focusing on three aging Jewish former partisans, Lithuania is, in essence, asserting a moral equivalence between Nazi war crimes – that is, the humiliation, torment and mass murder of Jews – and the defensive activities of Jewish partisans, who may have participated in resistance operations that resulted in civilian casualties. The three survivors include Yitzhak Arad, an Israeli historian and former chairman of Yad Vashem, who has written about Lithuanian wartime atrocities.

Lithuania is not the only place where such a recalibration of historical memory is taking place. While this reshaping of history is not the same as Holocaust denial – that is, it doesn't dispute what happened to the Jews of Europe at the hands of the Nazis – the net effect is a dangerous distortion of the historical record.

As part of a national project to reconstitute a history that they can live with, countries downplay or ignore the ways many inhabitants collaborated with genocide, and, at the same time, emphasize the ways these inhabitants have been victimized by historical forces. In characterizing Jewish resistance – resistance to being murdered – as simply another kind of war crime, no different, in essence, from Nazism itself, such reinterpretations of history place everyone – Jews, Nazis, collaborators, resisters – in the same pot, with perpetrators and victims being virtually indistinguishable.

While historians disagree about whether such recasting of history is motivated by anti-Semitism, or simply by the desire of certain countries to reconfigure their past in a way that helps solidify national pride, all agree on the outrageous misplacement of justice in accusations aimed at Jewish resisters to the murderous forces that destroyed their very families and communities.

In some ways, such distortions are more dangerous than out-and-out Holocaust denial, because rather than denying facts that are easily verified, they "cook" the facts into a different kind of stew, and, thus, may seem more persuasive.

It will be the task of the future to pay attention to such insidious revisions of history and to correct them. Our best tools will be – as they always have been – testimonies and memoirs of survivors, the work of researchers, and ongoing Holocaust education.

The Kirshner File

Templers from Germany brought modernization

Kaplan Street in Tel Aviv is one of the busiest thoroughfares in a crowded, bustling city, leading to the Israeli government media centre, the Ayalon expressway, the Arlozozroff railway station, the Ministry of Interior and the Azrieli towers (the vision of Montreal-based Israeli Canadian architect and real estate developer David Azrieli, who pioneered the concept of the indoor mall in Israel).

On Kaplan Street, you will also find what, until quite recently, was a tree-shaded, walled government compound known as HaKirya, which was largely the preserve of the Israeli army and guarded by sentries. It was off-limits to passersby unless they were authorized to enter.

Sheldon Kirshner in Israel

As a neighbourhood, HaKirya seemed different due to the architecture of its yellowish buildings. They exuded an air of both Europe and the Middle East and their roofs were made of maroon tiles. I invariably felt that they were transplants and had, in a sense, been parachuted into Tel Aviv.

Now the walls have fallen and HaKirya, at least one side of it, has been transformed into a municipal park. This development took place as Kaplan Street was widened.

There are several empty buildings on the site – which was once called Sarona – and the oldest one dates back to 1870.

Sarona, in the heart of Tel Aviv, was one of the earliest Templer settlements in Palestine. The Templers, driven by millennial fervour and a belief that the Second Coming of Christ was inevitable, were evangelical German Christians who settled in the Holy Land starting in the late 1860s.

A restored Templer building in Sarona

Their intention was to build a new social order grounded in traditional Christian values. A sect founded by the Wuttemburg theologian Christoph Hoffmann (1818-1885), the Templers were a breakaway group from the Protestant Lutheran church.

Apart from Sarona, they established settlements in Jaffa, Haifa, Jerusalem, Wilhelma, Galilean Bethlehem and Waldheim, erecting their last outpost in 1907.

Never numbering more 1,700 members, the Templers are credited with having played an instrumental role in the modernization of Palestine in such key sectors as construction, agriculture, commerce, industry and transportation.

Zionist settlers were no doubt influenced by their love of the land and work ethic.

With the British conquest of Palestine, the Templers were deported as enemy aliens. But after World War I, they were allowed to return.

The Templers, in general, had cordial relations with the Jews of Palestine, since their respective interests were not at odds. But with the rise of Adolf Hitler's National Socialist regime in Germany, some Templers began identifying with Nazism and joined local branches of the Nazi party.

During World War II, Britain interned Templers and later deported them to Australia. And in one particular prisoner exchange, they were swapped for Jews held in Germany.

Israel confiscated their property, officially bringing the Templer period to a close. Yet their ghosts linger on through their buildings, many of which have been stylishly renovated by new owners.

Sarona, one of the first modern agricultural settlements in Palestine, was constructed on land purchased from a Greek monastery. It was inaugurated in 1871, when Palestine was still a possession of the Ottoman Empire.

The first German colonists in Sarona experienced hardship as they battled the weather and an outbreak of malaria. More than 10 per cent succumbed to disease in 1872.

Yet they persisted as farmers, planting orchards, vineyards and vegetable patches and tending to livestock. An account of their lives, by Helmut Glenk, was published in From Desert Sands to Golden Oranges.

More than 200 Templers lived in Sarona in the final decade of the 19th century, amid a sprawl of 70 private and community buildings, barns, workshops and sheds.

By the 1920s, Sarona had a population of nearly 500. One hundred and ninety eight of the residents were removed to Australia in 1941, when Gen. Erwin Rommel's Afrika Korps threatened Palestine. The remainder were subsequently placed in internment camps. Gotthilf Wagner, Sarona's mayor, was assassinated in 1946.

With the end of the British Mandate in 1948, Sarona was taken over the Israeli government, and HaKirya, a serene oasis in a throbbing metropolis, was born.

Plans to demolish HaKirya were drawn up, but preservationists rushed in and prevented its wholesale destruction. City hall finally agreed to save 18 of the structures containing distinctive architectural flourishes.

Among them were the Friedrich Haring and Immanuel Steller buildings. Four of the buildings had to be moved to accommodate the widening of Kaplan Street. Today, Sarona, a leafy park with benches and tables set aside for picnics, has been completely gentrified and integrated into Tel Aviv's cityscape.

Further north, in the port of Haifa, another remnant of Templer culture exists in the German Colony on Ben-Gurion Boulevard, which is dotted with restaurants, cafes and boutiques.

Looking toward the heavily forested Carmel mountain range, you see the stunningly beautiful Baha'i gardens and shrine, one of the wonders of modern Israel. Looking in the other direction, you see ships in the harbour and the glint of the Mediterranean Sea.

The Templers arrived in Haifa in 1868, when it was a small, insignificant town inhabited by Muslims, Jews and Christians and just beginning to expand beyond the confines of its 18th century walls.

Purchasing land far from the centre, the Templers wanted to build the first planned agricultural community in Palestine. Their fields stretched into Kiryat Eliezer, these days a middle-class neighbourhood of apartment blocks shaded by eucalyptus trees.

Hard working and resourceful, the Templers opened workshops and an olive soap factory and created a tourist industry by building the first hotels and a road up to Mt. Carmel.

According to the Haifa Tourist Board, the Templers were among the city's most prominent doctors, merchants and engineers.

The community reached its apogee in the early 20th century, when Haifa was home to about 750 Templers.

A renovated Templer home in Haifa

By all accounts, the German Colony, with its neat homes and gardens, was a model of urban planning and an example to the rest of the population.

Typically, a Templer dwelling was fabricated of soft limestone taken from a quarry on Mt. Carmel. The house itself was on three levels. On the first storey was a kitchen, dining room and living room. Sleeping quarters were on the second floor. A cellar was used to store water and food.

Right after the Six Day War, when I visited Haifa for the first time, the former Templer quarter was rundown and seedy, totally neglected. As buildings crumbled, a coalition of preservationists persuaded the powers that-be that its revival could pay economic dividends, besides brightening up a blighted part of Haifa.

The effort has paid off in spades. The neighbourhood has been revitalized and has been a tourist draw for some time now.

As I strolled down Ben-Gurion Boulevard one sunny day, admiring buildings that once belonged to the Duck, Krafft, Ruff, Unger, Keller and Struve families, I conjured up images of industrious Germans working their fields and tending to their workshops and hotels in the New Jerusalem.

Israeli religious school network upgrades art school

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Tzvia, a network of religious high schools in Israel, has two priority projects for which it's currently raising funds: scholarships for needy students and a new building for its arts high school in Jerusalem.

Rabbi Efraim Grinfeld, Tzvia's director of educational affairs, and Yehoshua Adler, director of development for the Tzvia Educational Network, were in Toronto last month to meet with supporters here.

The network consists of 20 girls' schools (ulpanot) and five yeshivot for boys from Grade 7 to 12, serving a total of 6,000 students. Among them are about 300 Ethiopians, 100 olim from English-speaking homes and a handful of North Americans, although there is no program per se for overseas students.

Among Tzvia's schools is a 10-year-old arts high school for girls that Rabbi Grinfeld – who pioneered the program – says is unique in Israel for its combination of religious studies, academics, and the arts.

It reflects Tzvia's philosophy, based on that of the late Rabbi Tzvi Yehuda HaCohen Kook, which emphasizes, among other things, a love of God and community.

"We think that art is a very good binding to the world – to the history of the world, to the nation's history, and to [one's own] history," said the rabbi, a veteran educator with 32 years in the field, the last 15 at Tzvia.

Another Tzvia program of note is a three-year-old pre-med program in Haifa. The school is the only religious school among 10 Israeli high schools to participate in the pilot program, which includes a focus on science and medicine, along with hospital visits and even observation of surgical procedures, the rabbi said.

Also, he added, Tzvia is the only religious school in Israel – and one of only two in the country – that offers architectural engineering, a field whose practitioners can be licensed to build buildings of up to four floors.

It empowers women, providing them with an opportunity to work from home and earn a good income, he said.

Adler noted that religiously observant women in Israel have made strides in areas such as broadcast journalism in the past 10 or 15 years. Sarah Beck, a reporter for Israeli television's Channel 2 – who, as a religious, married woman, covers her hair – is a Tzvia graduate, he said.

Other Tzvia graduates include doctors, lawyers and high-level civil servants, he noted.

Most of Tzvia's female students enter Sherut Le'umi (national public service in lieu of army service) after high school, and volunteerism is a significant component of their Tzvia education.

"We think that one of the most important issues in education is to be involved," said Rabbi Grinfeld. "This is a part of our religious education – not to be closed in a ghetto of religious people. We need to go to our community."

About 60 per cent of Tzvia's budget comes from the Israeli government. The other 40 per cent is derived from tuition revenue – about $3,500 (US) per student, per year – as well as donations.

Raising a glass to celebrate kosher wine

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

It was both an education and a celebration of kosher wine last month when about two dozen people gathered for the "Raising a Glass" event.

Heebonics and The Canadian Jewish News, along with The House organized a wine tasting event that brought Rabbi Mordechai Levin, executive director of the Kashruth Council of Canada, to The House to speak about the kosher wine-making process and what makes wine sacred.

"In the kosher world, wine and meat are one of the few items that are especially sensitive as far as the productions and the actual process is concerned according to Jewish law," said Rabbi Levin, after the guests had a chance to taste wines from Israel, Argentina, Australia, Italy and Chile and to enjoy sushi provided by Umami Sushi.

He said that when it comes to blessing fruit, we always say the brachah, borei pri ha'aretz, except when it comes to wine. Wine has it's own blessing: borei pri hagafen.

"The Mishnah says that when we change the characteristics of the grape and elevate it, it becomes more than just a grape."

Rabbi Levin said that there is a debate about other foods that take on another form when processed, such as olive oil.

"Olive oil also goes through a similar change, but we don't change the blessing for it… There is something more characteristic of the wine, something that we are getting from it that elevates it to a special category," he said.

"There are two distinguishable characteristics that wine has which other foods like olive oil do not, and that is that it satisfies ones hunger and that it gladdens the heart. It makes one happy, it makes one feel good. It has the added attributes that the others don't have."

Also, he said, rabbis have chosen wine to sanctify the Sabbath and holidays, and as a result, the kosher wine-makers have to follow very strict guidelines.

For instance, kosher wine can only be handled by religious, shomrei Shabbat Jews from the time that the grape is pressed until it is sealed in the bottle.

"Historically, grape wine was used as a pagan ritual libation and wine was used for idolatry," Rabbi Levin said.

"We have to handle our wine differently because it is something that is kadosh, it's holy, something that we use for sanctity purposes."

He said that not only are non-Jews and non-religious Jews not allowed to handle the wine, but there are certain ingredients that effect the kosherness of the wine.

Many wine makers use gelatin that comes from animal fat or animal bones, or egg white, to give the wine clarity, he said. But most kosher winemakers use a substance called bentonite to drag particles to the bottom of the barrel.

He also spoke about the difference between mevushal (cooked or boiled) and non-mevushal wines.

When a wine is mevushal, it means that the wine is chemically different from non-kosher wine. Even if it is handled by a non-Jew after it is mevushal, it will still retain its kosher status.

But if a wine is non-mevushal, and it's opened, poured or handled by a non-Jew, it is no longer kosher.

"In order to get the wine at a certain level to put it in the bottles, they have to taste it, they have to sample it. If it is not mevushal, if it hasn't been pasteurized yet, it has to be done by a religious Jew because what causes the wine not to be kosher is any movement by a non-Jew," Rabbi Levin said.

"If [a non-Jew] picks up the bottle, if he opens the tap and the wine comes out the tap and he takes a sample, that in itself… according to Jewish law could make the whole vat not kosher."

He said that there is another restriction that is not halachic: that a non-Jew should not even look at the wine.

"It is an extra restriction that a lot of wineries follow because there are a lot of Chassidim that do want wine that hasn't been looked at by a non-Jew."

Rabbi Levin also spoke about other restrictions that arise during a shmittah, which just happened last year.

Every seven years, the land is left to lay fallow and all agricultural activity is forbidden according to Jewish law.

He said that new vines cannot be planted during shmittah, but grapes from existing vines can be harvested. However, wines produced during the shmittah will not be given kosher certification by most rabbinic organizations because there are many restrictions involved in the handling of those grapes.

"That is the reason why you won't find so many wines in the coming year with a kosher stamp on it."

Israeli, Canadian vets to be feted at Shabbat service

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Inspired by the national recognition Canadian soldiers get each year on remembrance day, George Stern wanted to honour Israeli and Jewish Canadian war veterans in his own way.

Stern, a Hungarian-native who survived the Holocaust as a hidden child and fought in Israel's War of Independence in 1948, said he got the idea to organize a special Shabbat service for Jewish war veterans when he saw Prime Minister Stephan Harper attending a televised remembrance day service.

"I saw the prime minister and it touched me how much they are sensitive to remembering every year. That is when I started to think that we have to do it," Stern said.

Canadian and Israeli war veterans and their families are invited to Beth Tikvah Synagogue at 9 a.m. on Nov. 1 for a Shabbat service in their honour. Following the service, Israel Consul General Amir Gissin will deliver a speech, as will Beth Tikvah Rabbi Wayne Allen.

"It will be special because we've gathered many veterans, Israelis who fought in the '48 or '56 or any war and they are now living here," said Stern, who is on the board of Beth Tikvah's ritual committee.

He said the invitation extends to all war veterans from any Canadian or Israeli wars and he expects to attract about 200 to 300 people.

"It doesn't matter if they are younger and fought in the '67 war or '73 war, every war was important. We defended our country, Israel. The Canadian veterans... there were a lot of Jewish veterans from World War II."

He said that within the group of Canadian Jewish war veterans, there are many who are machalniks, volunteers who fought in Israel's War of Independence after serving in World War II.

With help from Norman Gardner, former chair of the Toronto Police Services Board and a member of the Jewish War Veterans of Canada, Stern said he was able to extend an invitation to many Canadians, but tracking down Israeli war veterans living in Canada was more difficult because they are not as organized. He said he had help from the Israeli consulate in Toronto but he hopes that those he was not able to reach will hear about the event through word of mouth and will come to the service.

"There is a group, my friends, about six or eight people who fought in Israel. I know them personally and I invited them personally," Stern said.

Among the many veterans Stern expects are Joseph Warner, a machalnik who served in an anti-tank unit, Sam Wasser, who volunteered for Israel in the 7th brigade and Ben Ocopnick who served in Israel's army, navy and air force and played a role in the Aliyah Bet campaign, the illegal immigration movement that brought Jewish refugees to Israel.

Stern said that some of the veterans have promised him that they will bring archival photos from the wars they fought in.

"Whoever will give me pictures, I will put them on display," he said.

Stern, who has organized this event for the third time in as many years, said that honouring war veterans is just as important as honouring Holocaust victims.

"I think it's very important for young people, the new generation, to know about what happened, that people sacrificed their lives and their health," he said.

"The veterans are dying. There are not too many left in all of Canada, and we're doing it for the same reason that the Canadian government does it, to remember that they are worthy, to thank them. They deserve some appreciation in the last years of their lives. I feel this strongly."

For more information, Stern can be reached at 416-223-7481.

Koffler women honoured by Mount Sinai

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

When Marvelle Koffler was diagnosed with breast cancer 15 years ago, she was sent to Princess Margaret Hospital, where she recalls sitting in a "dark basement area."

That experience – along with a talk she heard by Evelyn Lauder, who had just founded the Evelyn Lauder Breast Center at New York's Memorial Sloan-Kettering Cancer Center – served as the catalyst for her to found a warm, inviting centre specializing in breast health and breast care at Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital.

The Marvelle Koffler Breast Centre, which opened in 1995 and now serves 33,000 patients a year, was designed to help women who have breast cancer move forward with their lives, both emotionally and physically, in the best way possible, Koffler said in a joint interview with her daughters Theo Koffler and Tiana Koffler Boyman.

On Sept. 22, the three women, along with Marvelle's daughter-in-law Anna Koffler, were honoured jointly by the Mount Sinai Hospital Auxiliary at its Living Legacy Endowment Fund luncheon, an event held every four years.

The fund generates interest for specific hospital-related projects, and this year's beneficiary was the breast centre, which opened in 1995.

Anna, who had to miss the joint interview and spoke separately to The CJN by phone, said that "environment plays a key role in people's therapy and getting better."

Of the four women, Anna is most directly involved with Mount Sinai, having served on various boards there for more than 20 years. In addition to fundraising for a variety of other organizations, she and her husband also funded the Tom and Anna Koffler Tolerance Training Centre at the Toronto offices of the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center.

Anna credited her own mother with sparking her interest in Mount Sinai and said that Marvelle has been "a great role model" for her in terms of giving back to the community.

"I consider fundraising my full-time work," Anna said.

The breast centre was the first of its kind in Canada, offering an array of services such as yoga, multilingual resource literature, nutritional counselling, coffee and tea served by volunteers, and support for male partners, Marvelle said.

It also serves male breast cancer patients, a small and sometimes overlooked population.

"Men may feel something and not associate it with breast cancer," Marvelle said. "Some of them think it will go away, and when they wait too long, they, too, die. For men, it can come up as a little blister on their nipple."

Recalling an early visit to the New York centre with her husband Murray and several Mount Sinai staff members, Marvelle said that Lauder had done "what I would have loved to have done.

"She created this atmosphere where you sink into lovely chairs. People are there to say hello. Their volunteers are special. They're trained to see if anyone is in such a state that they need an arm around them, or if someone is weeping in a corner, they try to bring them through it, or call in [a medical professional]."

Theo, who lives in San Francisco, said that from an early age, she recalls her parents – who support culture, health and education-related charities – saying that it's more important to give than to receive. She added that their philosophy has been passed down to their five children and 16 grandchildren.

Theo's philanthropic focus – her two "passions," she said – are therapeutic riding for the disabled, which she was instrumental in establishing in Israel in the 1990s, and her year-old non-profit, called Between Four Eyes.

The organization teaches mindful awareness in communities affected by conflict, including Rwanda, the Palestinian territories and Jordan. Its rationale is that inner peace will play a role in living peacefully.

Tiana, who is president of the Koffler Centre of the Arts, has chaired three women's golf tournaments that benefited Mount Sinai, and she has served on a patient and family advisory committee for the centre. She calls her mother the centre's "guiding light."

Likewise, she said that her parents' example has motivated her to become involved in the community and focus on projects that will become "lasting legacies."

Marvelle's own entrée into community work was the result of being asked by a family friend as a newlywed in 1951 to establish a "brides' group" for Hadassah-WIZO. "That was my first taste of getting involved in an organization."

She went on to become involved at high levels with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Weizmann Institute.

These days, Marvelle said, she is "backing off" from all but a very few involvements. She said that younger leaders "have to have room to lead, and room to breathe."

Holocaust Education Week 2008 Exhibitions

November 2 to 16

Cologne artist Willy Fick (1893 - 1967) created symbolic paintings during the dark rise of Nazism - works that gave voice to feelings the Nazis wished suppressed. Incredibly, in spite of the Nazis, fire and bombing, the works remain as photographic witness, opening a dialogue about the role the arts play in society.

Exhibition curator and Fick's grandniece, Angelika Littlefield, worked with nine Toronto Holocaust survivors and nine young people, diverse in age and culture, to create contemporary responses to feature in The Art of Dissent as signage and original art. The exhibition features 12 archival photographs, six of Fick's original works and 12 responsive works by student artists.

Rabbi moves back to classroom at CHAT

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Last month, Rabbi Lori Cohen became the first female rabbi and likely the first non-Orthodox rabbi to teach at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

Her hiring does not reflect a change in policy at the school, but rather its existing policy of "seeking out the most inspirational teachers regardless of denomination," said director of education Paul Shaviv.

Rabbi Cohen, 50, was a teacher long before she became a rabbi. After earning her B.Ed. from the University of Toronto in 1986, and her special education certification from York University in 1987, she worked as a special education teacher in Scarborough and then York Region for 10 years.

She now balances her half-time position at Tanenbaum-CHAT's Wallenberg (Wilmington Avenue) campus, where she teaches grades 10 and 11 Tanach, with part-time duties as spiritual leader of Temple Shalom, a Reform congregation in Waterloo, Ont. She also teaches Torah and Talmud once a week to residents at Baycrest.

From 2001 until earlier this year, she served as associate rabbi at Temple Sinai Congregation of Toronto.

A lesson from the teacher: "The ability to ask questions is more important to me than answers, because I think there are so many things in life that we don't have the answers to. The ability to see something from many different perspectives is important."

A native of Toronto who studied religion and philosophy at the University of Toronto as an undergraduate, Rabbi Cohen followed her mother's footsteps into the teaching profession after having done "a lot of volunteer work with kids" when she was growing up.

Her route to rabbinical school was somewhat more unusual. The rabbi, who converted to Judaism in her late 20s, spent six months on an Israeli kibbutz after she received her BA – the beginning of her journey to Judaism.

Later, she founded Or Hadash, a synagogue in Newmarket, and served as a lay leader there. She found she enjoyed studying, running services and leading the community, and was inspired to apply for rabbinical studies at Hebrew Union College.

A single mother at the time, she was accepted into the program and moved with her three sons – now 19, 21 and 26 – to begin her studies in Israel for a year, with four subsequent years at HUC's Cincinnati campus. While there, she also served as principal of Mercaz Conservative High School, a supplementary school for teenagers, from 1997 to 1998. She was ordained in 2000, and received an MA in Hebrew Letters from HUC in 1998.

With her current mix of work, Rabbi Cohen feels "very balanced." In the classroom, she wants to make Tanach relevant to her students' lives and encourages them to "ask more questions, not just regurgitate answers."

From left, TanenbaumCHAT students Danielle Arje, Shira Strauss and Mira Blumenthal joined Rabbi Lori Cohen to help build a house for a needy family through Habitat for Humanity.

"I want them to be creative in solving the challenges the Torah poses for us," she said. All her classes start with a blessing for the study of Torah.

On a strictly academic note, Rabbi Cohen said that she wants students to try to identify their learning styles. "If it's important for them to take notes, they should do that [even] while they're having a discussion."

Outside of the classroom, the rabbi continues to be involved in interfaith work with Muslim and Christian colleagues and their communities. Earlier this month, she helped organize a "Women of Faith Build" for Habitat for Humanity through the Canadian Centre for Diversity. Although most of her students at TanenbaumCHAT do not meet the minimum age requirements to participate in such projects, Rabbi Cohen took three Grade 12 students with her to help build a home for a needy family. She wanted them to experience women coming together from different backgrounds – and not incidentally, different generations – to work for "a common good."

CHAT students find way to help other kids

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Bins overflowing with hockey equipment may not be the first items we think of when our day school students decide to collect something.

But two Grade 12 students at the Wilmington campus of the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (TanenbaumCHAT) wanted to give something back to the community and initiated a project to do just that.

Joshua Smith and Marlon Rosenberg, co-presidents of the Toronto Maple Leafs fan club at TanenbaumCHAT, looked for a project that would be of interest to their fan club and would also be an exercise in tikkun olam (repairing the world).

Smith says that after their research and many phone calls to community organizations and hockey leagues, they contacted the Gord Summers Memorial Hockey League.

"We found out that it is the last free hockey organization in Canada where they give equipment and ice time to anyone that walks through the doors of the [Moss Park] Arena," says Smith.

Smith and Rosenberg established the CHAT Hockey Equipment Drive, to collect used and new hockey equipment for underprivileged children.

They prepared flyers that were posted in the school and they sent out e-mails to their family and friends.

"Within 2-1/2 weeks, we collected more than 12 overflowing bins of hockey equipment," Smith says.

The Gord Summers Memorial League has been in operation for 50 years. It is a non-profit organization operated by volunteers that gives children in the Moss Park and Regency Park areas a chance to participate in Canada's national sport.

With the help of parents, Smith and Rosenberg delivered four full carloads of equipment to the league, which is run out of the Moss Park Arena at Sherbourne and Queen streets.

"The president of the league, Jim Telfer, and vice-president, Will Wade, met us at the arena," Smith says. "They were overwhelmed by the amount of equipment that we had collected at CHAT and complimented us on the effort we put forward for the underprivileged children.

"They were very happy to receive the equipment, and Marlon and I are very happy that this project was such a success. We're considering other projects in the future that will help less fortunate young people."

Along with hockey equipment and free ice time, donations to the Gord Summers Memorial Hockey League help purchase sweaters and other equipment, and the league provides for a banquet for the children at the end of the season.

Smith notes that any equipment not used by the Gord Summers Memorial Hockey League is redistributed to the Council Fire Indian Association.

TopBunk: Camping out for Jewish identity

By Daniel Horowitz

There are many ways to ensure that our children are given the opportunities to connect to Jewish life while they are young, but one that might come as a surprise is quickly gaining momentum.

Research shows that only a few weeks at an overnight Jewish camp is a powerful and increasingly popular way to nurture Jewish identity, and the Toronto Jewish community is putting this idea to the test.

On October 17, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto launched TopBunk, an innovative incentive program designed to reach out to families less connected to the community and engage them through a summer of fun and a lifetime of memories.

By the program's close on February 15, grants worth $1,250 each will be awarded to first-time campers who attend one of the nine qualifying camps in the program. Children who return for a second year will receive a grant of $750.

U.S. research shows that Jewish camp alumni are 50 per cent more likely to join a synagogue, 90 per cent more likely to join a Jewish community center and twice as likely to donate $100 or more to their local community than Jewish adults who never went to a Jewish camp.

"Currently, 12 per cent of children eligible for this grant send their children to Jewish camps," said Dr. Ron Polster, director of UJA's Jewish Camping Initiatives. "We feel camp is an important portal to our community and a great way to inspire identity. Our goal with TopBunk is to triple the number of kids within our target market going to these camps within the first three years of the program."

UJA is not the only one which believes camp to be a critical community builder. A team that includes Toronto business and philanthropic leaders Joe Lebovic, Neil Nisker, and Ab Flatt are ensuring this becomes a funding option of choice for donors, with a fundraising campaign already underway.

"The earlier you get kids connected to their heritage the better. For me, it was Jewish summer camp that gave me that connection. Without it, I don't know where I'd be," said Lebovic. "This is a viable, and economically feasible way to carry on Jewish sustainability."

TopBunk provides a meaningful and fun Jewish summer camp experience

Karen Goldstein, a grandmother from Thornhill, couldn't agree more. Her 8-year-old granddaughter Raena, recently enjoyed her first overnight Jewish camp experience.

"We scheduled her for two weeks, but Raena stayed for an entire month, because she was having the time of her life," Goldstein says with a smile. "She accomplished so much, and it showed on her face when she returned home. She was confident, self-assured and proud – very proud of herself. There are great pictures of her laughing with friends, water-skiing, rope climbing. She tells us of Shabbat, and the morning services that she enjoyed, because the services were of history, stories she had never heard before."

The funds raised in Toronto will be added to $15 million in matching grants across North America for incentive programs like TopBunk being given by the U.S.-based Foundation for Jewish Camp.

UNITED JEWISH APPEAL OF GREATER TORONTO

Philanthropy is more important than ever says Professor Jack Carr

Economy will pick up again, assures Toronto economist

By Daniel Horowitz

According to University of Toronto Professor Jack Carr, the current economic downturn is one of many recessions we've experienced over the decades and one which will end with better times.

Carr should know. Besides being an active supporter of the Jewish Community for more than thirty years along with his wife Honey, he is also a well respected Professor of Economics.

"Despite the fact that we see constant economic horror stories when we turn on the television or pick up a newspaper, we must remember, this is not 1929; this is a recession - one of many we've had - usually every ten to fifteen years," said Carr. "Although the recession may affect people's incomes, they must be sure to put it into the broader, proper perspective that the bad times will end and the good times will return. And, like in those times, economic growth and prosperity will resume."

Carr also says the current economic climate makes philanthropic giving more – not less - important than ever. "When people are thinking about their annual charitable giving, they may be hurting from this economic downturn, but they have to understand that the needs of the Jewish community here in Toronto, and in Israel, are also hurting," explained Carr. "That makes it more important now than ever to give whatever you can to support the programs and initiatives of United Jewish Appeal and their partner agencies."

That's a view shared by David Koschitzky, Chair, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

"An unfortunate reality is that economic downturns are a double whammy," said Koschitzky. "They negatively affect the ability of our donors to give, while significantly increasing the needs of the agencies we support. This is not the first downturn the Toronto community has faced, and in the past, there have always been many within our community who have answered the challenge positively, by proudly stepping forward and saying hineni, I am here to help with community needs. Given the nature of our community, I am confident that this downturn will be no different."

So far, Koschitzky's confidence in Jewish Toronto has been rewarded as Campaign 2009 – chaired by Fran Sonshine and Henry Wolfond – is over $40 million

"It is a tribute to our campaign leadership, and to our community. But frankly, we are only at the beginning of the downturn, and we cannot lull ourselves into a state of false security," cautioned Koschitzky. "There will be challenges that we will need to face, and tough decisions that we will need to make, but together we will do it, in a manner that conforms to the Jewish tradition of tzedakah and community that is so ingrained and important to all of us."

Jodie Kaufman Davis, a volunteer with Impact Toronto, the UJA division representing young professionals, says that she is inspired by the community response so far to the recession. "Toronto's Jewish community exemplifies the notion of tikun olam (repairing the world). In the face of adversity, the community pulls together and digs within itself to come up with more resources. The strength of the community is remarkable. The Toronto Jewish community inspires me, as a younger member, to give back and be involved."

UJA initiative helped to get out the vote

By Howard English

Vote early and vote often. It's an old joke, which during the recent federal election was partially true for members of the Jewish community. They didn't vote more than once, but there were strong signs that Jewish voters cast their ballots in large numbers at advance polls, which were significant because federal Election Day fell on the first day of Sukkot.

Many responded to a mass call-out campaign by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, urging Jewish community members to vote for the candidate of their choice. The UJA initiative contacted nearly 20,000 homes.

"Our community's ability to make an impression on political leaders from all parties is dependent on the extent of our participation in the political process," said UJA Federation president and CEO Ted Sokolsky. "A strong Jewish voter turnout strengthens our voice as a community and in the democratic process."

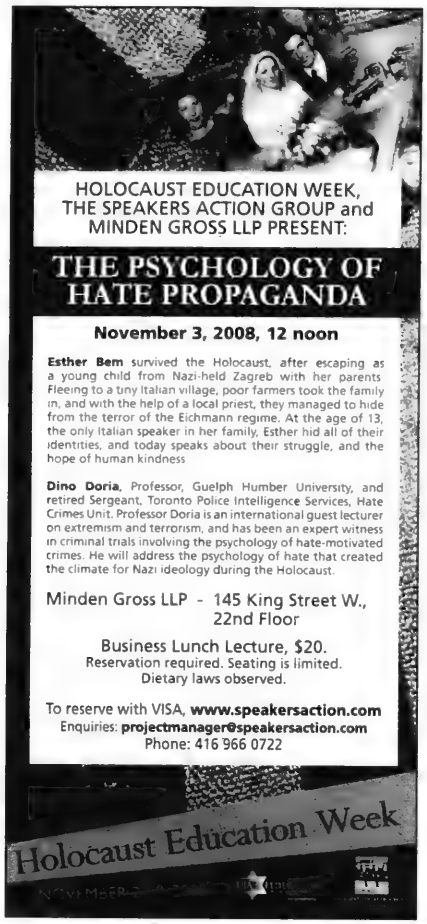
Many voters reported long line-ups at advance polling stations in ridings with large Jewish populations. On Friday, October 10, some advance voters in Thornhill and other ridings waited so long to vote they had to leave because of the onset of Shabbat.

Preliminary figures show some 10,000 advance voters in Thornhill alone. Statistics also demonstrate high Jewish voter turnout in the last provincial election. However, more detailed returning office voting figures from the federal election will not be available until at least mid-November.

(l-r) Moderator, CTV news reporter Naomi Parness, Conservative MP Jason Kenney, Secretary of State (Multiculturalism and Canadian Identity), Liberal MP Joe Volpe, Rosemary Frei, Green party candidate and NDP candidate Susan Wallace took part in an all party political forum at Toronto's Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue prior to the election. The forum was sponsored by UJA Federation, CJPAC, Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario Region and the Canada Israel Committee.

UJA Federation worked closely with affiliated organizations to not only get out the vote but also to keep the community informed about issues that mattered most to Jewish voters, through several avenues. Among them was a Jewish Community Political Forum featuring Conservative, Liberal, NDP and Green Party representatives. The forum was organized by UJA, CJPAC (Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee), Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario Region and the Canada Israel Committee.

"Increasingly, governments at all levels are helping to make it possible for us to meet community needs. Extensive Jewish voter participation sets a foundation for successful discussions with government leaders," noted Sokolsky.



'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Lessons from Noah, and Evan Almighty

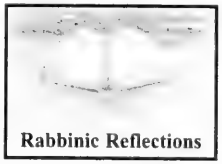
By RABBI HARVEY W. MEIROVICH

In the story of Noah and the Flood, we actually know very little about the reactions to Noah's grand carpentry scheme.



Try to imagine what went through Noah's brain upon hearing the divine command to build the Ark. Did he immediately believe God's transmission? How did his family react to seeing him with hammer in hand? Did he – or they, perhaps – think he was on the verge of mental collapse, a sure candidate for the psychiatrist's couch? What kind of reaction did he stir up among his neighbours?

Answers to these kinds of questions come to the fore in the recent adaptation of Noah's dilemma in the film Evan Almighty (2007). Buffalo, N.Y., newsman Evan Baxter is elected to Congress on the slogan "Change the World!" (This sounds all too familiar as we tune in to the upcoming U.S. election.) He's tapped by a corrupt senator to co-sponsor a land-grab bill that would lead to ecologically damaging development in national parks.

But in steps God, who gently orders Evan to build an ark (à la Noah) and to prepare for a personal flood. TV reporters and neighbours gather to belittle his antics. Drought grips Washington, D.C., his family deserts him, but still Evan believes. With conscience and faith working at full throttle, he risks family, career and his sanity.

In one sober scene, God lays down the primary spiritual lesson of human free will: "Let me ask you something. If someone prays for patience, you think God gives them patience? Or does he give them the opportunity to be patient? If he prayed for courage, does God give him courage, or does he give him opportunities to be courageous? If someone prayed for the family to be closer, do you think God zaps them with warm fuzzy feelings, or does he give them opportunities to love each other?"

Sages would have surely said amen to movie's spiritual insights

I have long contended that if the talmudic rabbis were living in our day and age, they would become movie producers, directors and, for sure, actors. Like the written genre of midrash, the medium of film so very often conveys deep insights about humanity. Movie-making at its best is privileged to delve into the complexities and perplexities of the human condition.

Here, then, are some spiritual insights from Evan Almighty to which our Sages would have surely said amen:

• Freedom to choose blessing or curse is God's gift to us as humans.

• Translation: it is our privilege to make a "green" heaven on earth, or to ruin the earth's sensitive ecosystem.

• How do we change the world? Through one single act of random kindness at a time.

• Like Noah of old, and Evan in the film, listen to your conscience, and be true to yourself!

The biblical 'trophy wife'

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Often times we read the narratives of the Torah and are filled with questions about the actions of God and humanity. The narrative of Noah and the Flood are no exception. We wonder about a corruption of creation that could be so astounding as to necessitate almost total annihilation. The midrash is filled with descriptions of this corruption within nature itself, including both animals and vegetation. One of the human corruptive acts, according to Genesis Rabbah, was that men started to take multiple wives.

Lamech is said to have taken two wives, one named Zillah and one named Adah. Through an interesting usage of the root words for these names, the midrash concludes that one wife was meant for procreation while the other wife was made sterile so she could be kept for pleasure alone. The midrash in Genesis Rabbah clearly states "this is what the men of the generation of the flood would do" and this action plays a part in God's decision to destroy the world. Yet, there are other narratives that involve multiple wives – in fact, two of our matriarchs, Rachel and Leah, are co-wives within one marriage.

The problem with Lamech is not that he took a wife to solve a fertility problem or that he, like Jacob, was tricked into a marriage. Rather, Lamech took two wives in order to redefine each woman from a complex being into a simple, single purpose being. One wife was intended only for procreation, defining the woman as mother, while the other wife was intended only for pleasure, defining the woman as lover. Lamech has set up an "either/or" definition for the women that is contrary to their natural composition.

When Jacob marries Leah and subsequently marries Rachel, it is through twists and turns of fate and balance that result in Jacob being tricked in parallel ways to his choosing to trick his father, Isaac. God makes Leah fruitful after she is married. She is not married for procreation alone. The text creates a tension between the women as they argue and struggle to define themselves. Leah strives to be lover as well as mother, and Rachel likewise strives to counterbalance her role as mother as well as lover.

While the family struggles internally for two generations to try and reconcile this issue, the text does not want us to find resolution. There is never a question that both Rachel and Leah stand together equally as Jewish matriarchs. If it were Leah alone, the Jewish woman would define by her model, meaning the Jewish woman is most fulfilled as mother. If it is Rachel alone, the Jewish woman would be most fulfilled as lover. The text maintains them both as matriarchs to affirm without question that women are complex beings, composites of mother and lover.

Lamech tries to redefine the woman within creation by taking two wives and deliberately forcing each to only manifest half of who they are. This action is seen as a self-indulgent corruption of creation.

And while the book of Genesis teaches us of the corrupt extreme in Lamech, the Zohar describes the ideal. According to the Zohar, "He who wins a wise woman by his own worth has won the greatest victory in life."

The Axial Age

By ALEX GROPPER

What has been called the Axial Age was one of the major breakthroughs in the intellectual history of mankind. It occurred from roughly the eighth to the third century BCE, a period that saw the radical transformation of the world's intellectual horizons.

Throughout the world, this was a time of restless intellectual ferment. In both India and China, there was a revolution in outlook with the ideas of Buddha and Confucius. The impact of both men has been enormous throughout the centuries and continues up to the present.

Past Forward

In the Mediterranean basin, the eighth century BCE saw the birth of the foundations of western civilization. Tradition tells us that the Phoenicians brought the alphabet to Greece in the early eighth century BCE. Shortly thereafter, Homer would use it to write down his immortal epics, the Iliad and the Odyssey. According to tradition, it was also in the eighth century, in 776 BCE, that the first Olympics were held.

In Italy, according to legend, the eighth century also saw the traditional establishment of Rome in 753 BCE. At the same time, in Israel, we saw the emergence of some of the greatest prophets, including Micah, Hosea and Amos. To the south, in Judah, the incomparable Isaiah came along at the end of the eighth century BCE, just in time to advise Hezekiah, the king of Judah, to resist the invasion of the Assyrian juggernaut of King Sennacherib. The Assyrians had destroyed the northern kingdom of Israel a scant two decades earlier and sent some of its people into captivity, giving birth to the legend of the Ten Lost Tribes.

Archeology gives vivid testimony to these activities. In Jerusalem, we have the broad wall that Hezekiah built, as well as the tunnel underneath the City of David that still bears his name. According to the eminent biblical scholar and archeologist Baruch Halpern, Hezekiah did much more, and archeology has left us traces of Hezekiah's activities.

Halpern argues that Hezekiah began the process of state centralization when he gathered up the population of the Judean countryside and brought the people to Jerusalem, to be protected by the walls of its newly constructed fortification system. Since the Six Day War, some of the fortification system has been excavated by Nachman Avigad and others in the Jewish Quarter of the Old City.

Between the destruction of the northern kingdom of Israel in 722 BCE and the siege of Jerusalem by the Assyrian king Sennacherib in 701 BCE, Jerusalem underwent tremendous growth in population. Some of this growth can be ascribed to the arrival of refugees from the northern kingdom of Israel. (Apparently, not all of the population was carried off into captivity.)

Halpern also comes up with a brilliant hypothesis in which he looks at the change in the architectural layout of Judean towns and villages and sees this as a reflection of Hezekiah's centralization, in which the old clan system in operation since the conquest of Canaan has been superseded by a new social framework that sees the king asserting central authority.

Hezekiah's grandson, Josiah, completed this process of centralization that involved religious reforms as well, in which worship was purified of pagan influences. When I excavated the City of David in Jerusalem in the late 1970s and early '80s with Israeli archeologist Yigal Shiloh, we found numerous votive statues of pagan gods, providing a clear reason for the necessity of religious reform.

Archeology has provided us with even more evidence of these reforms. Throughout the country, we have discovered various cult sites where altars were destroyed. At the same time, Jerusalem was built up as both a cult centre and a royal capital.

It was Josiah who was reputed to have discovered ancient texts that led to his purification of the Temple, in which he called on the people to re-dedicate themselves once more to their religion. Here was an ancient example of the Past moving Forward toward the Future.

In search of Israeli cuisine

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

A food war has been launched by the Lebanese Industrialists Association against Israel. The business association claims that Israel has stolen traditional Lebanese dishes such as hummus, tabbouleh and baba ghanoush. It wants to sue Israel to stop the marketing these foods as Israeli and is seeking the sole right to the names of these dishes. [tinyurl.com/guardianfood]

Not surprisingly, the story has caused headlines around the world. You can see how the controversy is being played to home markets by Beirut's Daily Star [tinyurl.com/dailystarfood] and by Israel's Ha'aretz. [tinyurl.com/haaretzfood] The Ha'aretz version has heated comments below the story. A brief sampling:

• Abu Firas Al Quds in Jerusalem: "Even food is not safe from the clutches of Zionism…"

• Ben in Toronto: "Claiming these things to be Lebanese would be like Israel claiming olive oil to be its own."

• Vijay in Boston: "Why not just enjoy the food and enjoy each other's cultures and stop hating each other?"

I'll leave it to the courts to decide – if it ever gets to that point – whether the Lebanese industrialists have a legal leg to stand on. In the meanwhile, I was curious about what food writers have to say about Israel'sindigenous cooking. So I scoured the web in search of Israeli cuisine.

"But what is Israeli cuisine?" asks food writer Judy Nathan. "A cuisine is usually defined as cooking that derives from a particular culture. Since the Jewish population has essentially been dispersed throughout the world, Jewish food, and by extension that of Israel, while centred in the Jewish dietary laws, subsumes the cuisines of countries throughout most of the globe… In Israel the 'new food' is a hybrid, inspired by every corner of the world, but with an increasing emphasis on native ingredients." [tinyurl.com/nathanfood]

Jodi Kantor traces the influences on the early Zionists in her New York Times article, A History of the Mideast in the Humble Chickpea. "The newly arrived Jews needed a cuisine to suit their new identities and surroundings. 'Their native food was inappropriate for the weather and the produce,' [food writer Claudia] Roden said. Not surprisingly, they were enchanted by the smoky eggplant dips, rustic breads and aromatic spice mixtures of Palestinian cuisine. As Najwa al-Qattan, a Palestinian-American and a professor of Middle Eastern history at Loyola Marymount University in Los Angeles, put it, 'If you were given the choice between falafel and gefilte fish, which would you choose?'" [tinyurl.com/timesfood02] Ouch.

Speaking of which, gefilte fish, cholent, kishke and knaidlach were brought to Israel along with the Jewish immigration from central and eastern Europe, as Israeli food and wine writer Daniel Rogov points out. It would be hard to make the argument that these are indigenous Israeli foods. [tinyurl.com/foodrogov]

So is there an indisputably Israeli food whose pedigree would stand up in the court of public opinion, as well as in the International Court of Justice? Yael Zisling says that "many of the dishes that are often thought of as Israeli, including the finely cut Israeli salad, can often be traced to the Middle East in general, Mediterranean, North African or the Balkan regions. I subscribe to the school of thought that believes that a real local cuisine has not yet developed." [tinyurl.com/iscuisine]

Writing in Ha'aretz, Doram Gaunt does mention a couple of contenders. "Israeli couscous" is made from hard wheat flour and is oven-roasted – unlike North African couscous that is made from semolina. The bead-shaped food – ptitim – made its debut as a substitute for rice during the early days of the state. [tinyurl.com/haaretzfood02] You can see a delightful ad for Osem ptitim on YouTube [tinyurl.com/ptitim]

And Doram Gaunt's other candidate for the quintessential Israeli food? Bamba, a peanut-butter-flavoured snack that makes up 25 per cent of the country's snack food market. [tinyurl.com/bamba1] Something tells me that the makers of Bamba need not be overly concerned about a protest from the Lebanese Industrialists Association.

Iran suffers a pair of setbacks

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Iran continues to make news, most recently because the United Nations rightfully denied it a seat that it had eagerly sought on the Security Council.

On Oct. 18, Iran lost its bid to gain a seat as a non-permanent member of the Security Council, representing the Asia region, to Japan. (The council has five permanent and 10 non-permanent members. The latter, determined by geographical region, sit for two-year terms.)

On Oct. 18, Reuters reporter Patrick Worsnip supplied the details of the vote in the General Assembly.

He wrote: "As expected, heavyweight Japan defeated Iran for an Asian seat coming vacant on Jan. 1, but the scale of its victory – a crushing 158-32 votes from the 192-member assembly – delighted western countries at loggerheads with Tehran."

Britain's ambassador to the UN, John Sawers, was thrilled that Iran gained so few votes. "Its comprehensive defeat, a thrashing of Iran, is a very important signal of the whole membership's concern about Iran's actions," he said.

An additional benefit is that Japan, a western ally, replaces Indonesia, the only current non-permanent council member that opposes sanctions against Iran.

A brief Agence France-Presse report, "Israel cheers Iran's rejection" (Montreal Gazette, Oct. 20), described Israel's reaction to the news.

AFP quoted Israeli prime minister-designate Tzipi Livni as saying: "The simple fact that Iran was able to present its candidature was unacceptable. By rejecting it, the United Nations spared itself embarrassment."

AFP added: "Livni said Iran was defeated because it is under UN sanctions for refusing to comply with demands to suspend nuclear enrichment amid fears by the West that Tehran is developing nuclear weapons."

Iran's sound defeat at the UN coincided with worries in Tehran about the steep decline in crude oil prices. Iran has relied on high prices to prop up its faltering economy, which is strained already by inflation and the impact of limited UN economic sanctions.

While none of this might force Iran to desist from its nuclear development program right away, according to some experts ("Iran scrambles to stem oil price plunge" Los Angeles Times, Oct. 20), Iran might be forced, if economic conditions continue to worsen, "to moderate." One expression of this could be the election in June of a replacement for President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who came to power on the promise of economic prosperity.

Regarding the Oct. 10 "According to Reports" column examining Hamas' involvement in underground smuggling from Egypt, further interesting details were recently provided by Toni O'Loughlin in "Hamas exploits boom in Gaza smuggling tunnels" (Guardian, Oct. 22):

"Hamas is receiving a steady revenue licensing illicit tunnels in Gaza's south to smugglers and businesspeople who are importing fuel and other items from Egypt to meet shortages created by Israel's blockade of the Palestinian territory…

"Smuggling has become a lucrative and entrenched part of the economy. Omar Shaban, a Gaza economist, estimates that smuggling comprises about 90 per cent of market activity in the territory and is worth around $30 million (18 million pounds) to $40 million [US] a month…

"Last month, Hamas began charging tunnel owners a 10,000-shekel annual licence fee. Most tunnels are located in Rafah, and its mayor, Issa al-Nashar, said there are now about 400 of them. Other sources, however, estimate the number is closer to 600 – and that the fees comprise 20 per cent of the Rafah municipality's revenue… .

"Hamas security forces patrol the tunnels, while the municipality has set up a committee to collect the fees. Rafah also requires the owners to pay 1,000 shekels for electricity and is now pressuring them to sign contracts promising to pay up to $40,000 to the families of tunnel workers killed on the job. Forty people have died working in the sandy, unreinforced underground passages so far this year."

However, along with many others reporting from Gaza, O'Loughlin refers only to Israel's "blockade" as motivating the smuggling. He ignores the fact that during the "ceasefire" with Hamas, Israel has been shipping, on average, over 100 truckloads of goods into Gaza daily, except when rockets and mortars are launched into Israel. Yet the smuggling continues to grow, because, apparently, it's a very lucrative business, especially for the "incorruptible" Hamas.

FALL 2008 LECTURE SERIES AT HOLY BLOSSOM TEMPLE

Telling the Zionist Story Anew
Israel Explains Itself to the World

When much of the world de-legitimizes Zionism and the State of Israel — now more than ever — Jews and our friends are required to tell the story of the Jewish State, to tell of its history and values, to tell of the dignity Zionism endowed to the Jewish People, to tell of the progressive nature of the State of Israel and the Zionist Movement that brought everything about. Please join us for the second of four speakers who will tell the Zionist story in his own way. All lectures will take place on Wednesdays at 8 p.m.

Daycare worker gets damages in holiday dispute

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Quebec Human Rights Tribunal has ordered a daycare owner to pay $2,000 in moral damages to a former Jewish employee who insisted on taking off two days – unpaid – for the High Holidays.

Judge Pierre Audet ruled in favour of Daniela Strauber, a former employee at the Garderie Educative Le Futur de l'Enfant Inc., owned by Evangelia Kalogrias. He found that the daycare owner discriminated against Strauber on the basis of religion, a violation of the Quebec Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms.

Strauber, who now lives in Victoria, B.C., filed a complaint in October 2004 with the Quebec Human Rights Commission after she said she was fired for refusing her employers' demand that she take off just one of the days of Rosh Hashanah.

Owner ordered to pay $2,000

Kalogrias testified that she could not find a substitute for both days. She also denied that she fired Strauber, saying the latter quit of her own accord, giving two weeks notice.

The tribunal found that Kalogrias violated Strauber's right to equality and dignity "without distinction, exclusion or preference" based on religion and failed in her duty to accommodate her employee's religious beliefs.

In effect, the tribunal said that an employee should not have to choose between keeping a job and violating his or her faith, unless an employer has taken all reasonable steps to avoid this.

The tribunal, however, rejected the commission's recommendation that the daycare pay Strauber the total sum of $8,059.29, including $2,059.20 in material damages for lost salary and $6,000 in moral damages.

Because of the contradictory testimonies, the tribunal could not establish if Strauber had, in fact, been dismissed, so it didn't award any material damages. It also reduced the recommended moral damages by two-thirds, stating that the final amount is "just and reasonable" under the circumstances.

Strauber, a Romanian immigrant, was hired by the daycare in November 2003 as a temporary educator for a group of two-year-olds, replacing a staff member who was on maternity leave until October 2004.

Strauber testified that toward the end of August of that year, she asked Kalogrias if she could be absent Sept. 16 and 17, without pay, to celebrate the Jewish new year. She said she had never in her life worked on Rosh Hashanah, even in Romania.

At the same time, another educator Mery Benoualid, who was responsible for children the same age, also asked for the same days off for the same reason.

The tribunal heard that Kalogrias said she would think about it and get back to them.

On Sept. 10, 2004, she informed Strauber and Benoualid that she could not allow both of them off on the same two days, citing difficulty in finding substitutes. She proposed that Strauber and Benoualid take off one of the two days each, of their choosing, or both take Thursday, Sept. 16, only, because she could not find a substitute for Friday.

On Sept. 13, Strauber told Kalogrias that her religion required her to not work on either day and that it was out of the question to be off for only one day.

According to Strauber, Kalogrias replied that her decision was final, and that Benoualid had decided to be absent on Sept. 16 only, adding that if Strauber didn't show up, she would be suspended for three days without pay.

Strauber said she was surprised and upset by the response and felt like she was being punished like a child, but she suggested the name of a possible substitute or that Kalogrias herself look after the children for one day.

Kalogrias refused to change her mind, so Strauber said she would take off the two days and accept the suspension.

Later the same day, Strauber testified, Kalogrias called her into her office, where Kalogrias' husband, Chris Didaskalou, was also present.

He said she was being let go because the couple found her behaviour unacceptable, that her acceptance of the suspension showed she had little interest in her work and that she was causing a disturbance among her co-workers.

Strauber said she was given a letter to sign terminating her employment, but she refused to sign it.

The next day, Strauber called the Commission des norms du travail and Canadian Jewish Congress concerning her rights.

She testified that losing her job was very disturbing to her, especially on the eve of the holidays. She said she felt like she was back in Romania, where she hid her Jewishness, and never thought she'd be in the same situation in Canada.

On Nov. 1, 2004, she found a job in another day-care centre.

Rabbi David Bitton was a witness for Strauber, confirming the importance for Jews to refrain from working on Rosh Hashanah.

Kalogrias gave a different version of events in her testimony. At the time of Strauber's employment, the daycare had nine educators and one substitute educator for about 80 children, aged 18 months to four years and divided into nine groups.

She said she tried to find a substitute for both days of Rosh Hashanah, but could only find one for the first day and not the second, which was a Friday.

She also said September, the beginning of the year, is a difficult month at a daycare because the children cry more and parents are more anxious. Also, that summer, an educator had resigned and she was short-staffed.

She said she told Strauber she would be suspended for only one day for taking the two holidays off. She described Strauber as aggressive and impolite.

Kalogrias said it was Strauber who quit and gave two weeks notice.

Kalogrias told her to not come back to work because of the "tension" she was causing within the daycare, but said she was paid for the two weeks.

She said she did not give Strauber a letter to sign, but asked her to submit in writing her resignation.

Toronto cantor retires

Kirshblum and his wife Linda have also led 12 bar bat mitzvah family tours to Israel.

"Many of the children from these tours have ended up by taking their undergraduate and graduate studies in Israel, and some have married and made aliyah," the cantor said.

He added that "while I will be retiring from the amud at Adath Israel Congregation, I plan to remain involved in the daily life of the synagogue.

"I have no regrets and will always remain open to new challenges that may present themselves, for I am surrounded by a wonderful family and friends, and I have truly been richly blessed by HaShem."

The Kirshsblums have three children, Risa, Shari and Jonathan, as well as five grandchildren.

A proponent of ethical kashrut

the rabbi said that his uncle, with whom he said he has a close relationship, made a decision to focus on other areas and that his "partner" at the time, the Sephardi chief rabbi, Rabbi Eliyahu Bakshi-Doron, served as a strong positive force in dealing with conversion issues.

A proponent of ethical kashrut before the issues at Agriprocessors – the kosher meat processor in PostvIlle, Iowa, that faces charges for alleged child labour and immigration violations – became commonly known, Rabbi Lau said that a teudat kashrut (certificate of kashrut) for restaurants in Israel refers to food only.

"It's not enough," he said. "If we want to go in and have a coffee, I want to check if the manager in the restaurant gives his waiters complete rights. I want to check that people with disabilities have the ability to go inside that restaurant. How can I as a religious Jew sit in a restaurant that my friends cannot go in?"

He said about 200 restaurants in Israel have a certificate of ethical kashrut from an NGO called Maaglei Tzedek (Circles of Justice) in partnership with Beit Morasha.

Similarly, Rabbi Lau said, he is working with Maaglei Tzedek to look at ways in which synagogues and yeshivot can be more inclusive.

He believes that change "will take many years… but we can see a bit here, a bit there.

"We need to be part of the process."

Israeli-Palestinian peace key to relations with Islam: Blair

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Solving the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is the single most important step in improving relations between the West and the Islamic world, former British prime minister Tony Blair said last week in Montreal.

"If we are able to resolve the Israeli-Palestinian dispute, protecting the security of Israel and [creating] a state for the Palestinians, nothing will do more to say to that region that we in the West do not have a double standard, that justice is not only for those of the Judeo-Christian tradition, it is also for the Islamic people," he said.

It will also be a powerful symbol in promoting Western values elsewhere in the world where allies are needed, added Blair, who has been special envoy of the so-called "quartet" of Middle East peace negotiators – the United Nations, European Union, United States and Russia – since July 2007, shortly after leaving political office.

Blair, the guest of TD Bank Financial Group, spoke to about 1,000 people at the Palais des congrès under heavy security that included an electronic search of everyone entering the room.

"I'm absolutely convinced that there is no way we can tackle this global menace of Islamic terrorism unless we are capable of persuading people in that region of our ideas and values," he said.

"Yes, they are about freedom and democracy, but we stand for more. The idea of justice and equity is what our societies are about, not just getting and spending, but compassion for the less fortunate," he said.

Tony Blair

That altruism extends beyond our borders, he added.

"Our values are not just right for us, but are what is best for mankind, not because they are superior but because they are the values free people choose, and what people want today is to be empowered, not to have the state sitting on them."

Virtually every country in the world today faces the threat of Islamic extremism, he said, and many Arab countries are just as fearful as the West, including Libya, Algeria, Yemen and the Gulf states. He called this extremism a "perversion of Islam," and said he believes that many Muslims are still moderate and want peaceful co-existence with the West.

The rapid global economic downturn has demonstrated dramatically the interdependence of nations in the world today, he said, calling for the strengthening of international alliances and institutions to find global solutions.

"The challenges are global, and countries can't exist in isolation politically, economically or on security anymore. The worst thing we could do is disengage and shut ourselves off from others. We must be more open than ever before."

The United Nations, he said, is not capable of the global response that's needed, because it is operating as if it was still 1948.

He underlined the need to strengthen relations between Europe and North America.

Canada can play a pivotal role because it understands the perspectives of both Europe and the United States, Blair said.

"Without strong alliances across the Atlantic, strategies against terrorism are not going to work," he said.

"Being an ally with the United States can be difficult, but it has stood us in very good stead over the years."

He later said that the reason he was so supportive of America after 9/11 is that he viewed the attack as one on the West as a whole.

"If it's true that no country today is strong enough on its own to guarantee solutions to these problems and that it is true we must build alliances, then the idea of pursuing narrow national interests is simply wrong – not morally, but because it is not realistic," he said.

Later, in conversation with former New Brunswick premier Frank McKenna, now deputy chair of the TD Bank Financial Group, Blair urged Canada to keep its troops in Afghanistan.

"This has got to be won, because if we retreat from Afghanistan we will be pushed back everywhere. If we do not stand up and fight for what we believe in, Hamas, Hezbollah, the Shiite militia and Al Qaeda will all take heart in it.

"They will lose heart if we stay and get the job done... We have no option but to see this through."

He added that the battle "cannot only be won with weapons, but by the force of our ideas."

McKenna also wondered how long it will be before Israel feels "it has no choice but to act unilaterally against Iran," an comment to which Blair did not respond directly.

Blair said he felt U.S. President George W. Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice have made some progress in the Middle East conflict in the past year. "We now have a strategic understanding of how to move the process forward."

The next U.S. president should be a strong leader who is able to take tough positions, he said, but he should also be able to listen.

חדשה בקנדה

נינה שנהב

"נו, אז את מתקשרת אליהם, או לא?" מאיר, בעלי, מביט בי בחושר סבלנות.

"בסדר, בסדר" אני אומרת בעודי מחיינת את המספר של יניב ואפרת, ידידינו החדשים. "מענה קולי," אני לוחשת למאיר "להשאיר הודעה?" "עזבי עזבי." כך מאיר ואני מנתקת.

"אני לא מתכוון לשבת פה בבית לבד. אני רוצה לשבת בסוכה בערב החג." התייע לי מאיר. "נכון, אין לנו כאן משפחה, אבל הכרנו כמה זוגות חביבים למדי. בואי נתחיל להתקשר אליהם כדי לאחל חג סוכות שמח, ולדרך אגב, נקשיב היטב ובריכוז, ואולי לא בכוונה, מישהו יזמין אותנו כאושפיזין".

"צריך לשנות טקטיקה." החלטתי למאיר, בעודי מזפזפת בעצבנות (בסדרה המשפחתית, כולם ישבו סביב שולחן האוכל, ובדיוק הנכדים ניסקו את הסבתא החיינית, והבן דוד חיבק את האחיין התינוק. וגם האח של האבא נישק שם מישהי שלא היתה אישתו, אבל זה ממש לא העניין כרגע, נכון?).

"אנחנו צריכים פשוט להיות אסרטיביים. להוביל את השיחה להזמנה, ברגע של היסוס וחוסר ריכוז מצידם, ישר לצעוק: 'כן! בואו!' נשמח להתארח אצלכם בערב סוכות!' פשוט מאוד." אני מסכמת.

אני מחיינת לגלית וירון.

"היי גלית!" אני מצייצת בשימחה נדולה "רצינו לאחל לכם חג סוכות שמח!" והנה גלית שואלת: "אז איפה אתם בסוכות?" אני מסמנת ו זהיר לעבר מאיר הנרגש, ועונה "בשום מקום. אין לנו סוכה, אנחנו די לבד. הילדים נזרא מסכנים. כנראה שנאלץ לשבת בבית בערב החג לחלום על המשפחה המפוארת שחוגנת בישראל בעתנו כאן, לבד..." גלית שותקת לרגע ואז אומרת "אוש, מסכנים. נקווה שבכל זאת יהיה לכם נחמד. אנחנו מוזמנים לחברים מהעבודה של ירון. זה כזה כייף. יש לו איזה ארבעה קולנות יהודיים, אז כתבו חוגגים יחד!"

אני מנתקת לגלית בפרצוף, מאיר נאנח.

"את יודעת מה?" אומר לי מאיר "מי צריך אותם בכלל! למה שניראה לכולם מסכנים ובודדים? זה לנמרי לניטימי. אנחנו בקושי שנה אחת פה. חייבים להיות חיות חברה מהרנע הראשון! הרי בישראל היו לנו מיליון חברים."

"נכון," אני מסכימה "הכרנו את החבר'ה האלה עוד מהתיכון, צריך לתת לעצמנו איזה קרדיט."

"אנחנו לא מרחמים על עצמנו יותר! מעכשיו, כששואלים אותך איפה אנחנו בחג, את אומרת בשטון ובשמחה: אנחנו כבר מסתדרים, מתארחים ומאושרים!"

"נכון." אני מסכימה נוטלת בנבורה את השפורת ומחיינת ליניב ואפרת (אלה מתחילת הכתבה, שבחיים לא בבית). הפעם אפרת דווקא כן עונה. אני כולי איחולים, התלהבות ושמחת חיים. כשההתעניינות המהוססת מניעה מצד אפרת, אני כבר מדקלמת: "הו, מרוב הזמנות, פשוט התלבטנו איפה להיות. הזמינו אותנו כל כך הרבה חברים, ובסוף התלטנו על ארוחה נדולה עם כולם. אנחנו כל כך מאושרים!" אפרת קצת שותקת, ואחר כך אומרת בשקט: "אה, יופי. אני שמחה בשבילכם. כי לנו אין שום תוכניות, וחשבתי שיהיה נורא נחמד אם תבואו אלינו לסוכה, ככה בערב החג, ונחנוג יחד. אבל אתם כל כך משתרים, מילא..."

Tali Nizic appointed as Chair of Reena

Tali Nizic has been named Chair of the Board of Reena. She has been a member of the Reena Board since June 2005 and will take up this two year appointment on September 7, 2008.

"I am delighted and honored to be appointed to this prestigious position at such exciting times," Nizic said. "Reena is such a valuable organization dedicated to integrating individuals with development disabilities into mainstream society with the emphasis on providing Judaic programming and a Jewish environment."

As a Reena Board Member, Nizic chaired the agency's Continuous Quality Improvement (C.Q.I.) committee of the Board which ensures that the quality of care and services provided by Reena are reviewed on a proactive and progressive basis to best serve client needs. In 2004 she was a key player to Reena's Family Forum Committee on 'Empowerment', was a member of Reena's Family Involvement Committee and also served as a member of Reena's Education Task Group.

"My goal as chair will be to promote Reena's vision about choices, commitment and partnerships; choices for individuals who want greater say in the direction of their lives and for families who need assistance in planning and providing supports in the future" Nizic explained. "These are exciting times as Reena embarks upon a multi-million dollar campaign to build the Reena Community Residence at the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Centre in Richmond Hill. Reena is the lead agency in this unprecedented model of shared service delivery with four partner agencies in the Toronto area: Chai Tikvah, Circle of Care, Jewish Family and Child and Kehilla. The residence will provide affordable, supportive housing for 84 persons with disabilities."

Tali Nizic is President and CEO of Controllers On Call, a niche staffing organization specializing in the placement of middle to executive level accounting, finance and human resources professionals in contract and full time positions. Prior to her current position, she worked with CA firms, and was the Director of Finance and Administration for the Donwood Institute, as well as the Director of Corporate Services for JVS of Greater Toronto. Her particular expertise is in understanding how business and how Non-Profit organizations work.

ABOUT REENA

Reena is a non-profit social service agency dedicated to integrating individuals who have a developmental disability into the mainstream of society.

Reena was established in 1973 by parents of children with developmental disabilities, as a practical alternative to institutions. Reena strives to create and maintain an environment that respects and promotes dignity, individuality, independence and freedom of choice within a framework of Jewish culture and values. In 1977, Reena began receiving funding from the Ministry of Community and Social Services and, since that time, has grown rapidly.

JVS program helps homeless

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

After battling addictions and losing custody of his young son, Andy took part in an innovative JVS Toronto project and got his life back together.

Reena Kronitz

Funded by the City of Toronto's Homelessness Partnership Initiative, the project – it began in 2007 and was recently renewed for another year – provides pre-employment and vocational support for recently housed individuals who are preparing to enter the workforce.

Reena Kronitz, JVS chief psychologist, said clients are referred to them by workers who think the clients could benefit from such a program to help them move forward with their lives.

The JVS assessment is comprehensive, she said, and includes a cognitive evaluation and a look at learning aptitude, mental health issues and vocational aptitude.

"At the end, we come up with recommendations about how each individual – mostly men ages 21 to 60s from a variety of ethnic groups – can move on."

She said they address such issues as physical and mental health, education, training, pre-employment skills and an exploration of career opportunities.

"They all come in at different places in their lives, so some are able to move on to employment while others may find success receiving disability support."

JVS psychologist Hadley Koltun said they work with each client individually for about three months to work through their action plan.

"We're talking about people who have had trouble making it to one appointment, and they come back and back to work on their action plan. It's a huge achievement for them.

"We have to entice clients to come, so in order to get them in the door, we feed them and give them a transportation voucher. The staff also puts them at ease."

He said most people they have seen have moved forward in terms of what they need to do to function in a healthy way.

Speaking at last month's JVS annual general meeting, two years to the day since he was off drugs and alcohol, Andy said that when a counsellor recommended the program in March 2007, he had been sober for six months but was living in a shelter for men while his son was in the care of the Children's Aid Society.

"They didn't know what to do with me, I was in such rough shape. I jumped at the chance to find out who I was, and why I had become that person."

When he met Koltun and JVS staffer Ivanka Burazin, he said, "I didn't know they were going to be a big part of a dream I had, [which was to totally] rebuild myself.

"They came up with 13 recommendations, and I've accomplished 12 of them. [JVS] has been part of my life for the past 18 or 19 months."

Through Burazin, he said, he was hired by Goodwill on a part-time basis, and then volunteered at the Furniture Bank, where he was eventually hired.

"Without a job, I felt like nothing, but then I started gaining control of my life. I started respecting myself and other people, and my self-esteem grew."

Now, he said, he is living his dream. "I have my own place, and my son lives with me. Working didn't just help me, it helped my son."

Cancer researcher gets the Gold Medal

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — For Dr. Aaron Schimmer, the awards just keep on coming.

At the recent annual meeting in Ottawa of the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons of Canada, he received the Gold Medal in Medicine, which recognizes original research conducted by a physician in the first 10 years of his or her practice.

In a relatively short number of years in practice, Schimmer – a cancer researcher at Toronto's Princess Margaret Hospital and a 1987 graduate of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto – has amassed a steady stream of awards and honours, including a listing last year as one of Canada's Top 40 Under 40 – from Caldwell Partners, a national search firm – and recently being named a scholar in clinical research by the Leukemia and Lymphoma Society of America.

And Schimmer, who holds five patents for new cancer treatments is still – just barely – under 40.

"It was quite an honour to receive the award, considering that past recipients include many illustrious Canadian physician-scholars," Schimmer said of the Ottawa ceremony, which was attended by his wife, Ettie, and their two children, and was also the convocation for new specialists in medicine and surgery.

"The evening was certainly filled with much pomp and ceremony. The platform party, of which I was a member, was dressed in full academic robes in the colours of the universities we graduated from, and we were led into and out of the ceremony accompanied by a bagpiper."

Schimmer received the gold medal for his research identifying a protein called FLIP, which can be found at higher levels in cancer cells and allows them to metastasize, and he was also recognized for his drug research.

"The {FLIP] discovery was a team effort and included work done by six individuals in my lab, as well as collaborators at Princess Margaret and centres in the United States," Schimmer said.

"I think this work, like the other projects in my lab, demonstrate how important breakthroughs in medical research can be achieved by bringing together scientists from diverse backgrounds, including molecular biology, chemistry, clinical medicine and imaging. Together we can make contributions that exceed what an individual or a single laboratory can accomplish."

Because it takes many years for a new drug to progress from the lab to being used in a clinic and investigating its effectiveness on humans, Schimmer and his colleagues have been working on identifying older drugs that have been approved for other purposes, but may also have previously unrecognized anti-cancer effects.

Clinical trials with these "repurposed drugs" can be launched within two years of discovering such attributes, as opposed to more than 10 years for new drugs.

"One of the drugs we identified is ciclopirox olamine. It's currently used for the treatment of topical fungal infections. We demonstrated that it kills cancer cells and shrinks tumours in mouse models of cancer," Schimmer said.

"With the aid of the Leukemia Lymphoma Society of America and Kansas University, we are creating an oral version of this drug. Clinical trials with the oral version of the drug should be starting at Princess Margaret Hospital in the middle of 2009. The initial trials will be conducted in patients with blood cancer for which other treatments have not worked."

Obituary

Archives founder was known for walking tours

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Stephen Speisman, who founded the Ontario Jewish archives in 1974 and had an unparalleled knowledge of Toronto's Jewish history, died Oct. 22 of a heart attack at his home in Thornhill. He was 65.

Speisman retired in May of this year as executive director of Toronto Hebrew Memorial Park/Pardes Shalom Cemetery following a medical leave of absence that began almost three years ago after he underwent surgery for cancer.

He had taken on the cemetery position on a part-time basis in 1999, and left the archives two years later to devote himself to the job full time.

A native of Toronto who grew up near Bathurst Street and Dovercourt Road before moving to North York as a young teenager, Speisman was educated at the University of Toronto, where he studied American history as an undergraduate, changing focus for his PhD.

His doctoral thesis served as the basis for his book, The Jews of Toronto: A History to 1937, a winner of the 1980 City of Toronto Book Award.

An active member of Adath Israel Congregation in his teenage and young adult years, Speisman taught bar mitzvah and Sunday high school classes there. In a 2004 lecture, he credited the shul "in great measure" for his observance of mitzvot.

Rabbi Erwin Schild, rabbi emeritus of Adath Israel, recalls Speisman's "enthusiastic participation" in services.

The 'consummate chasan Torah'

On a personal note, he told The CJN about a family car trip to Florida when the Schilds invited the then-teenage Speisman, who was friendly with their son, to join them. "It was admirable how he knew the historical significance of all the cities we passed through... It was so enjoyable to travel with him and hear his commentary. He was a very great mind, a wonderful historian and a very reliable person."

Although Speisman was "strictly Orthodox in his private life," he understood and related well to people who were not, his wife, CJN reporter Leila Speisman, said in an interview.

As well, she recalled, he stood behind her when she reported on controversial issues, taking pride in her work.

The son of a klezmer musician who later became a barber, Speisman was a fan of chazzanut and classical music, especially baroque. He was also a family man who invented fanciful bedtime stories for his three now-grown daughters, telling them about the adventures of three little girls who lived in a magic land.

More recently, he took his oldest grandson to visit a fire station, and he also planned to visit his daughter Joanna Stavsky's Grade 3 class at Eitz Chaim Schools to talk to her students about Jewish pioneers.

Speisman was the "consummate chasan Torah" in terms of his passion for learning and the way he "lived Torah," said Rabbi Baruch Taub of Beth Avraham Yosef of Toronto Congregation in a eulogy, referring to one of two special honours given on Simchat Torah, the day of Speisman's death.

As well, said the rabbi, Speisman was a "chasan Bereshis" who demonstrated by example that one could "be a Torah Jew in the world at large. Steve insisted with tenacity that both were holy."

Speisman's funeral was held at the synagogue, where he was an active member from the day it opened, serving as gabbai, chevrah kadisha member and the shul's longest-standing board member. As well, he led prayers for almost three decades, the rabbi said.

In the larger community, Speisman was known for the walking tours he gave of old Jewish Toronto, creating impressions that were so vivid "one could see the mothers bustling on Friday preparing for Shabbos," Rabbi Taub said.

Seymour Epstein, senior vice-president of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education (the Mercaz), knew Speisman as a teenager from their days in Adath Israel's youth group.

"He was a pretty serious guy. He was always excited about history. I think what really came through was the sweetness of his soul," Epstein recalled.

Speisman leaves Leila, his wife of 36 years; daughters Joanna Stavsky, Tammy Speisman and Shevi Urbach; grandchildren Yitzchak and Eliezer Stavsky, and his sister Susan Lebow.

On Campus

Workshop takes aim at campus anti-Semitism

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Friends of Simon Weisenthal Center (FSWC) presented a workshop late last month to help Jewish and pro-Israel students become better equipped to deal with hostile anti-Israel campus groups.

Avi Weinryb, FSWC's campus associate, presented the workshop, titled "Anti-Semitism on campus," to about a dozen students.

He spoke about the "new anti-Semitism," which he said often appears in the guise of anti-Zionism. Holocaust denial and unfair or hostile condemnation of Israel or Israelis.

"When someone criticizes Israeli policy or questions decisions made by the government, this is legitimate criticism… When someone calls for the dissolution of Israel, or holds it responsible for crimes it never committed, this crosses the line."

Weinryb showed images from anti-Israel events on Canadian campuses.

Avi Weinryb presents workshop on anti-Semitism on campus

He said that in February, anti-Israel groups held a rally at McMaster University as part of Israeli Apartheid Week there.

He said the chanting went from "Death to Israel" to "Death to Jews" and "Viva jihad."

Hamilton police investigated whether this was a hate crime, and in August, they charged some of the demonstrators.

"When you're walking around campus, it's not fun to see… It's very disheartening," Weinryb said.

He said that while university administration can't stifle free speech as long as it doesn't cross the line into hate speech, anti-Israel groups have learned to talk around hate speech.

"When they say death to Israel, they really mean death to the concept and everyone who supports it."

During his presentation, Weinryb showed images from the University of Western Ontario from last February, when students carried signs that said, "The genocide goes on. Gaza needs your voice now."

"Genocide is a very heavy accusation and it's clearly inaccurate," Weinryb said. "Israel is not committing a genocide… Why would kids at Western use such a word? Because words have power."

He said the sentiments that are prevalent around campuses all over the world generally don't paint a positive picture of the State of Israel, and when negative terms and images are repeated, they stick.

"If you've come down from Thunder Bay and you've never met a Jew in your life… and you hear these things, it has an effect."

Another image from UWO showed a student holding a sign that said, "Gaza is the world's largest concentration camp."

"This is an example of Holocaust trivialization… In a concentration camp, people were systematically murdered or worked to death… People were branded and treated like cattle, exterminated. So to say that Gaza, where people can walk around freely and shop, work, people can play on the beach, it is a very unfair comparison, and it trivializes the Holocaust," Weinryb said.

"I don't want to say that Gaza is all fun and sunny, because it's not, but to blame it all on what's going on in Israel isn't fair, because they need to look at other factors, like the corrupt Hamas government."

He asked the students in attendance how they would react to specific scenarios, such as finding a swastika scrawled on a bathroom stall, seeing a sign for Israeli Apartheid Week, or hearing a professor refer to Israel as Palestine during class.

One student said that the reaction to some scenarios would differ depending on the school.

He said that if he heard a student in class refer to Israel as an oppressive state that was guilty of ethnic cleansing at a school like Ryerson University, where class sizes tend to be smaller than those at schools such as York University or the University of Toronto, he would most likely know the student who made the comment and would feel more comfortable pulling them aside after class to set them straight.

Weinryb shared a story about one of his professors who referred to Israel proper as Palestine. He said it bothered him, but he didn't speak up.

"I sympathize with students who feel like their grades can suffer from speaking up, because they can."

Weinryb said that while a student may feel too intimidated to voice their concerns at an anti-Israel rally, it might help to be present and record what happens so he or she can report back to authorities if need be.

He also said it's important for students to control their emotions and not take part in a shouting match. He said filing a formal complaint with university administrators, getting involved with Jewish campus groups such as Hillel or getting an article published in the campus press is more effective.

"Be proactive, not reactive. Advocate and keep up with the facts," he advised.

Weinryb said he hopes to make the community more aware of what Jewish students face on campus and to persuade university administrations to step up and say that anti-Israel events on campus are not acceptable.

"It may not qualify as hate speech legally, but it creates a toxic environment on campus and makes it uncomfortable, and we need to take a responsible approach to this."

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 10, 2008
KRISTALLNACHT
8:00 p.m.
Congregation Habonim
5 Glen Park Avenue
WITH FELICIA BRYN & SHALMI BAR-MOR
Featuring the riveting story of Felicia Bryn's efforts to survive the Holocaust as a 5-year-old child in Poland. A decade after the war's end, following a visit from Israel's Diplomatic Representative to Poland, Felicia struggles to uncover her true self amid the lies that had been essential to her survival.
Felicia Bryn, Holocaust survivor and author of Never Forget to Lie, is an eloquent and courageous writer and speaker. Ms. Bryn will recount her experiences as a hidden child saved by a family of Righteous Poles, as well as her long and arduous return to her Jewish roots.
Shalmi Bar-Mor has designed Holocaust curriculums for Israeli and American Jewish high schools and is the founder and past director of Holocaust Education at Yad Vashem and current Director of ECHO (Education Culture Heritage Origins). Mr. Bar-Mor will tell this story from the perspective of the Israeli diplomat who figured so prominently in Felicia Bryn's life, and will also discuss the unique experience of the hidden child during the Holocaust.

Israeli food and history in eyecatching new book

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Janna Gur's gorgeous new book, The Book of New Israeli Food (Shocken Books, September 2008), puts Israel on the culinary map – exactly where it deserves to be.

This book is a feast in every way. The recipes and photography are awesome. Not only are the recipes well-written and easy to follow, it is also a fascinating pictorial history of modern Israel. If you aren't actually in Israel, you'll want to hop the next flight to Tel Aviv! And even if you're not a cook, this book would make a wonderful souvenir to bring home with you.

Gur is the founder and editor of Israel's leading food and wine magazine. "In less than 30 years," Gur writes, "Israeli society has graduated… to a true gastronomic haven.

"Twenty to 30 years ago, the only memorable culinary experience tourists might have had was a good hummus in the Old City of Jerusalem or a hearty Israeli breakfast at a hotel."

Today they can experience world-class wines, excellent locally produced cheeses that rival those of Europe, sophisticated cuisine created by celebrated Israeli chefs, and delicious local ethnic food.

With full-colour photographs of both the food and the places, this book is cookbook, guide book and history book. Recipes include standards such as falafel, shawarma, pita and cholent, as well as updated dishes like Figs Stuffed with Bulgur and Cranberry Salad, Fish Ceviche with Eggplant Cream and Chocolate and Halva Coffeecake, many of them coming from Israel's top restaurants chefs.

Information on open air markets, fishing in Israel and the Israeli Shabbat add to the book's appeal. A section on special ingredients identifies the unusual, although most are easily obtained and will be at least somewhat familiar to most cooks. Beautiful and comprehensive, this book will become an immediate favourite with anyone who has even a passing interest in Israeli cuisine.

The author also does a good job of explaining all the differences between ingredients, all the equipment you might need and recipes for spice mixes and condiments that may be difficult to find outside of Israel.

FIGS STUFFED WITH BULGUR, CRANBERRY SALAD

Figs, fresh or dried, with their sweet luscious flesh and firm skin, are perfect for stuffing. Here is a light, healthy dish to start off a meal.

10 fresh figs
pomegranate concentrate, for serving 3 1/2 oz. bulgur wheat water
1/2 cup dried cranberries, chopped coarsely
1 cup carrots, grated coarsely
2-3 tbsp. fresh coriander, chopped
1 tsp. sesame seeds, roasted
3 tbsp. pecans, chopped
2 tbsp. pomegranate concentrate

Soak the bulgur wheat in water for 4-5 hours, until it swells up and softens. Or add half a cup of water to the wheat and cook in a microwave oven for 3-4 minutes until the bulgur softens and absorbs the water. Allow to cool.

Mix the bulgur with the other salad ingredients. The preparation up to this point may be done in advance and the salad kept in the refrigerator. Halve the figs and scoop out some of the flesh, which you can add to the salad. Place two fig halves on each plate, heap on the salad, sprinkle with pomegranate concentrate and serve. Serves 10.

TURKISH SALAD

This red piquant booster to your pita is prepared with fresh vegetables that "cook" in the refrigerator.

1 large onion, chopped
2 tomatoes, diced finely
2/3 cup fresh parsley, chopped
1 sweet red pepper, diced
1 tbsp. tomato paste
1 1/2 tbsp. ketchup
salt and freshly ground black pepper
1 tbsp. olive oil

Mix the onion, tomatoes and chopped parsley and add the red pepper, tomato paste and ketchup. Season with salt, black pepper and olive oil. Refrigerate overnight.

Take out of the refrigerator half an hour before serving. Serves 4-6.

Polls show Obama making big gains with Jewish voters

By ERIC FINGERHUT
JTA

WASHINGTON — Presidential candidate Barack Obama is making significant gains among Jewish voters, according to two new polls.

The polls suggest that after months of hovering around 60 per cent, Obama appears to be within striking distance of the 75 to 80 per cent of the Jewish vote won by the three previous Democratic nominees for president.

A Gallup tracking poll of 564 registered Jewish voters, taken over the first three weeks of October, found Obama leading Republican John McCain by a 74 to 22 per cent margin. That was a 13-point increase in support for the Democratic nominee since Gallup's July poll, which had Obama leading 61 to 34 per cent.

Gallup also released Jewish data from tracking polls in the two previous months showing a steady rise for Obama. The Illinois senator garnered 66 per cent in August and 69 per cent in September, with McCain at 25 per cent for both months. The margin of error for the October survey is plus or minus five per cent.

Meanwhile, a Quinnipiac University poll taken Oct. 16 to 21 in Florida found Obama winning 77 per cent of Jewish voters in that state with just 20 per cent for McCain. While the Jewish statistic was based on a relatively small sample size of 87, and has a margin of error of plus or minus 10.5 per cent, the finding is notable because some leading Jewish Democrats in the state had publicly worried this summer about resistance to Obama among South Florida Jews.

Barack Obama

Obama's progress comes despite the Republican Jewish Coalition's barrage of negative ads painting him as a dangerously inexperienced candidate who has surrounded himself with anti-Israel advisers.

But some Democratic operatives say that such concerns over Obama's experience seem to have been overtaken in some Jewish voters' minds by worries about the inexperience of Republican vice-presidential candidate Sarah Palin, as well as the Alaska governor's conservative political views on hot-button social issues such as abortion.

Ira Forman, the executive director of the National Jewish Democratic Council, said that while he saw a few reasons for Obama's rise among Jewish voters, he felt "the single biggest factor" was Palin.

An American Jewish Committee survey in early September found that just 34 per cent of the Jewish community approved of McCain's pick for running mate and 57 per cent disapproving.

Forman also cited what he said were numerous anecdotal and media reports of Jewish voters in swing states who were unhappy with the McCain choice.

Jewish feelings about Palin appear to match those of the overall electorate. An NBC News/Wall Street Journal poll released last week found 55 per cent of voters believe Palin is not qualified to serve as president. Her lack of qualifications was seen in the poll as the biggest concern about a McCain presidency.

Matt Brooks, the executive director of the Republican Jewish Coalition, rejected the idea that Palin – who has voiced staunch support for Israel and a hard line on Iran – was a factor in the recent swing toward Obama among Jewish voters. "I don't believe this has anything to do with Sarah Palin whatsoever," he said. "Nobody I know is voting for vice-president."

Brooks attributed the decline in support for McCain in the Jewish community to the "volatility" in the electorate during the recent economic crisis. He argued that as Obama gained ground in the country as a whole in recent weeks, he naturally also gained ground among Jews. Saying he expected the race to tighten nationally, Brooks predicted that McCain's numbers in the Jewish community would bounce back as well.

Still, the Palin pick may have nullified McCain's greatest strength in the Jewish community, Democratic observers said.

In addition to citing the Palin selection, both Forman and Democratic pollster Mark Mellman emphasized the extensive efforts by Obama and his campaign to introduce the Democratic nominee to the Jewish community. The campaign has sent dozens of Jewish surrogates – including Jewish members of Congress and well-known figures such as former mayor of New York City Ed Koch and former special Middle East co-ordinator Dennis Ross – to key states to talk about Obama's background and his views on Israel and the Middle East.

Ahmadinejad denies rumours of ill health

"Our chemical engineers have upgraded Iran's missile capability," he was quoted as saying.

Hamedani didn't elaborate, but Iranian officials have said they successfully tested a solid fuel motor for the medium-range Shahab-3 ballistic missile, a technological breakthrough for Iran.

Experts say solid fuel increases the accuracy of missiles in reaching targets. But many in the West have expressed doubt about Iran's professed military accomplishments.

Iran launched an arms development program during its 1980-88 war with Iraq to compensate for a U.S. weapons embargo. Since 1992, Iran has produced its own tanks, armoured personnel carriers, missiles and a fighter plane.

Last week, the Iranian speaker of parliament, Ali Larijani, declared that Iran was proud of its support for the Palestinian Hamas and Lebanese Hezbollah movements, rejecting claims that it could be considered support for terrorism.

He said the support was part of Iran's commitment in the region to assist its neighbours in fighting occupation, and he accused the United States, the West and Israel of contradicting the values of freedom and democracy.

"They are freedom fighters fighting to defend their country and independence. That is not terrorism," he said about Hamas and Hezbollah.

In related developments, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said on Sunday he was healthy, countering reports suggesting he was ill and suffering from exhaustion, and that his political future could be threatened.

Ahmadinejad, who was elected president in 2005, has not said whether he will seek a second term in the June 2009 presidential race, but he is widely expected to run.

Asked on state television about his health, he said: "We are human like all others and catch colds. No, I am not ill."

A member of parliament and close associate of Ahmadinejad, Mohammed Ismail Kowsari, told the official news agency IRNA on Saturday that some websites had spread rumours about Ahmadinejad's health and had suggested it could harm his chances of running for president again.

"Any human might come down with weakness as a result of workload and pressure. This is something natural," Kowsari said, adding that those who used such a "psychological ploy" of spreading rumours would fail.

The president has been criticized for surging inflation, which has hit 29 per cent, and now faces the added challenge of tumbling oil prices, which are cutting into Iran's main source of revenue.

Late Saturday, Kowsari told IRNA that Ahmadinejad was feeling under the weather because of the strain of his position, saying, "The president will eventually get well and continue his job."

Kowsari accompanied Ahmadinejad last month to the United Nations General Assembly. "Every human being can face exhaustion under such a workload," he added.

He gave no further details about the state of the president's health.

Ahmadinejad, who rarely misses meetings and public appearances, cancelled a speech last Wednesday and did not appear at a cabinet meeting the same day. But the president, who turns 53 on Monday, did attend a religious ceremony on Saturday in Tehran, though he looked tired as he greeted supporters.

On Sunday, Iranian state TV also showed him receiving credentials from three foreign ambassadors.

In recent weeks, some supporters of Ahmadinejad have been discussing potential candidates for the June 2009 election, implying that the sitting president is not their automatic choice.

Since the 1979 Islamic revolution, every Iranian president has been re-elected to a second term, except the first one, Abolhasan Banisadr, who fled the country in 1981.

The months ahead are critical for Ahmadinejad if he wants to try to rebuild his political base and rebut critics who point to his unfulfilled campaign promises, including extending Iran's oil revenues to poorer provinces around the country. With more than 10 per cent unemployment and 30 per cent inflation, Iran was unable to bask in record-high oil prices earlier this year.

Criticism over his management of the country has increasingly come from his erstwhile conservative backers.

Ahmadinejad is also confronting questions about his uncompromising stance with the West over Iran's nuclear program, which has severely soured international relations. The United Nations has placed three rounds of sanctions against Iran since Ahmadinejad took office in 2005 over Iran's refusal to halt uranium enrichment.

In related news, a poll by the Dahaf Research Institute showed Livni's Kadima party would win 29 of parliament's 120 seats, the same number it has now, and Benjamin Netanyahu's Likud taking 26, if elections were held today. A TNS Teleseker survey gave Kadima 31 seats to Likud's 29.

Both surveys said Labor, which now holds 19 seats and is the second-largest party, would win only 11 if elections were held this week.

"I stand at the head of a rooted, values-oriented party, and I invite every citizen to think of what Kadima has brought us in its three years of existence," Barak told Israel Radio Monday, rejecting suggestions that his party was considering a joint list with Livni's.

Earlier in the day, Labor cabinet minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer told a Tel Aviv radio station that "there's not much difference between Kadima and Labor," adding that in the current political reality, parties "must run as blocs and not run separately."

The surveys showed the country's right-centre and left-centre blocs fairly evenly split, a deadlock that has paralyzed peacemaking in the past.

Livni tried to avoid propelling Israel toward its third national election in six years by keeping the current government intact. But coalition partners, most prominently the 12-seat Shas party, used the situation to press for new demands that she refused to accept. In a meeting with President Shimon Peres on Sunday, Livni said she would not give in to what she called political blackmail.

Elections are expected to take place early next year, a year and a half ahead of schedule.

The surveys published Monday suggested that the public approved of Livni's tough stand against the political horse-trading and did not reproach her for failing to marshal a coalition. But the advantage was narrow and could easily evaporate, especially if new Israeli-Palestinian violence erupts.

Netanyahu, who has been pressing for new elections for months, did not comment publicly after Livni officially abandoned her coalition-building efforts, but he was to have a wide forum when, as opposition leader, he addressed the nationally televised opening of Parliament's winter session later Monday.

Commenting on the polls, Likud faction head Gideon Sa'ar said the contest between the two leaders would be tough.

"But I believe the majority of the public wants a new course… that will improve the country's economy and security," he told Israel Radio.

Training flight crash

A military plane crashed in southern Israel, killing a pilot-in-training and his flight instructor. The double-engine plane, on a routine Israeli Air Force school practice flight, crashed near the Tze'elim military base in the Negev Desert. The plane, a French-made Fuga Magister, called a "Zukit" in Israel, has been used by the Israeli Air Force since 1957, and is set to be replaced by the American-made T-6A. It is the second aircraft crash during a routine flight in two months. A Cobra helicopter crashed in early September while on a drill in the Jezreel Valley, killing the pilot and co-pilot.

Four die in small plane crash

Four people were killed in a plane crash near Moshav Batzra in the Sharon plain last Friday. Paramedics who arrived at the scene declared the pilot of the Cessna 172 model plane and her three passengers dead. After departing from Herzliya in the afternoon, communication with the plane was lost. The cause of the disaster was not known by press time. Transportation safety inspectors and police were investigating.

Qassam lands near Ashkelon

A Qassam rocket launched from Gaza by Palestinian terrorists landed near Ashkelon last Tuesday. In response to the attack, Defence Minister Ehud Barak ordered all crossings between Israel and Gaza closed the next day. The Hezbollah-Palestine organization claimed responsibility. More than 20 Qassam rockets have been fired from Gaza at Israel since an Israeli-Hamas ceasefire went into effect four months ago.

Nasrallah poisoned?

Hezbollah denied a report that its leader was poisoned and by Israel. The state-affiliated Iraqi website Almalaf reported that Hassan Nasrallah was poisoned last week and Iranian doctors rushed to Lebanon to save him. Israel was responsible for the assassination attempt, the site said, citing its sources. The report said Nasrallah continues to feel ill after being in critical condition for several days.

Knighthood for Peres?

Britain's Buckingham Palace is considering awarding President Shimon Peres honorary knighthood during his expected visit next month. If knighted, Peres would join a long and distinguished list of international philanthropists and social figures given the title over the last few years, including Microsoft founder Bill Gates, U2 singer Bono, former French president Francois Mitterrand, former German chancellor Helmut Kohl and former New York mayor Rudolph Giuliani. Peres would not be able to use the title "Sir," however, as he is not a British national.

Kristallnacht ceremony vetoed

JTA

BERLIN — The German town of Goerlitz is refusing to allow its Jewish community to hold its own ceremony marking Kristallnacht.

Instead, the only ceremony marking the 70th anniversary of the Kristallnacht pogrom will be held in the town's restored synagogue by representatives of the local Protestant church, whose commemorations have traditionally focused on all victims of the Third Reich.

The small Jewish community had planned to bring a Torah scroll from Dresden into the newly renovated synagogue, which dates from 1909. It's the only synagogue to have survived Kristallnacht in the state of Saxony.

But the city insists that ceremonies must be secular and inclusive. The former synagogue was deconsecrated after the 1938 pogrom. Following its six-year renovation, the structure now has room for 230 guests.

"The city has cancelled the entire event planned by the Jewish community and the Society for the Promotion of the Synagogue," which was to include several performances and speeches, Alex Jacobowitz, cantor and chairman of the town's tiny Jewish community, told JTA.

He insisted that the Jewish community's program would be inclusive.

The Society for the Promotion of the Synagogue is a secular group authorized to hold ecumenical events in the building. It co-operates with the Jewish community. Now, only the ceremony run by the local Protestant church is still scheduled to take place in the building.

The city bought the synagogue from the remnant Dresden Jewish community in 1963, and then formally purchased it again from the Claims Conference after German unification, according to Jacobowitz, a musician who came from New York to Germany in 1991.

The approximately 30-member Jewish community has held services in a small sanctuary within the building for about a year, Jacobowitz said.

Argentine prosecutor calls for Iran embargo

JTA

BUENOS AIRES — Argentina's chief prosecutor accepted a request from a survivor of the AMIA bombing for an embargo of Iranian assets.

The survivor, whose name remains classified, was severely injured in the 1994 terrorist attack on the Buenos Aires Jewish centre and is demanding $1 million (US) in reparations.

The embargo would prevent Hezbollah from using its money and assets in the country or moving it until a judge decides whether or not to attach it to a verdict in favour of reparations.

The survivor alleges the attack was planned by former leaders of the Iranian government and carried out by the Lebanese terror group Hezbollah.

Prosecutor Alberto Nisman agreed to the embargo based on accusations by the Argentine justice department against the Iranians and Hezbollah regarding responsibility for the attack.

While the judge in charge of the case, Rodolfo Canicoba Corral, will ultimately decide whether to accept the prosecutors demand, Iranian officials in Argentina say they have no obligation to co-operate.

Syria has become Hezbollah's de facto arsenal: MI chief

By BARAK RAVID
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Military Intelligence Chief Amos Yadlin told the Israeli cabinet on Sunday that Syria was continuing to arm Hezbollah and that it had become the Lebanese militia's arsenal.

"[President Bashar] Assad is continuing to throw open the doors of Syria's warehouses for Hezbollah, and has become 'Hezbollah's arsenal.' Assad trusts Hezbollah more than his own army, and Hezbollah operatives act in Syria as if it's their own [country]," said Yadlin.

A key Israeli demand in indirect peace negotiations with Syria is that it cut its ties with Hezbollah, and in particular, cease supplying the group with weapons.

Yadlin did actually say he believed Assad was interested in a peace deal with Israel "on his conditions," but was waiting for the establishment of a new administration in the United States.

Yadlin added, "The Syrians have removed almost every restraint. In their irresponsible behaviour, they are giving Hezbollah possession of almost every strategic capability they own."

When asked about a car bombing in Syria in September that left 17 dead, Yadlin said, "Those who sleep with dogs shouldn't be surprised when they wake up with fleas."

"This was an attack carried out by global Jihad... which is aided by the Syrian regime, which gives [terrorists] immunity and free passage to Iraq and Lebanon."

Yadlin also said that Hezbollah is still seeking to avenge the death of its former deputy chief, Imad Mughniyah, who was killed in a bombing in February that shook a residential neighbourhood of Damascus. No one has claimed responsibility for the blast, but Hezbollah says it was orchestrated by Israel.

Yadlin said that Hezbollah is holding off from an attack only out of their fear of a harsh Israeli response and that it is pursuing indirect means of attacking Israel. One way, he says, has been by increasing their activities in the Gaza Strip, from where they could potentially attack the Israeli home front or target Israelis travelling in Sinai. Yadlin added that such meddling in the Gaza Strip is not in the interests of Hamas, which is seeking to preserve a fragile ceasefire with Israel in Gaza.

In related news, a Syrian diplomat called a U.S. helicopter strike on a Syrian village near the border with Iraq on Sunday an "outrageous crime," adding that Syria reserves the right to respond accordingly.

Eight civilians were killed in the strike, which Syria said targeted a civilian building under construction.

A U.S. military official, who confirmed the strike, said Sunday that the attack targeted elements of a robust foreign fighter logistics network and that due to Syrian inaction the U.S. was now "taking matters into our own hands."

The Syrian state-run news agency SANA reported that Syria has also called on the Iraqi government to carry out an immediate inquiry into the attack and to ensure that Iraq was not used for "aggression against Syria."

Qaim, across the border in Iraq, had been a major crossing point for fighters, weapons and money coming into Iraq to fuel the Sunni insurgency.

Last Thursday, the commander of U.S. forces in western Iraq said in a briefing with Pentagon reporters that American troops were redoubling efforts to secure the Syrian border, from where some fighters were continuing to enter Iraq.

Toronto harpist plays on Passchendaele's soundtrack

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The CJN

With a career that spans more than three decades, harpist Erica Goodman has played on countless television, radio and film productions, including the current film Passchendaele.

"I love playing music for film because it's very disciplined – it teaches you to play very accurately, the microphone is close, so you have to play cleanly, precisely and in time," said Toronto-born Goodman.

The score for Paul Gross' World War I drama was written by Polish composer Jan Kaczmarek, who is best known for his 2004 Oscar-winning score for Finding Neverland.

"The music in Passchendaele is austere, gripping yet magical in a special way," said Goodman. "Kaczmarek has an interesting style known as minimalist. It's repetitive – you do the same phrases over again, and then it changes slightly. It sounds easy, but it's quite difficult to play very beautifully. You need to have control."

Goodman, principal harpist with the 45-piece Esprit Orchestra conducted by Alex Pauk, recorded the Passchendaele soundtrack over four days of recording sessions at CBC's Glenn Gould Studio, while Kaczmarek and Gross looked on. Goodman played in a sound booth to isolate the harp, so it could be phased in and out during sound editing. "Even when you're playing with the group, you're playing like a soloist – they can really hear what you're doing. You're not blending in," she added.

In September, Goodman and the Esprit Orchestra recorded music composed by Alexina Louie and Pauk for Rhombus director-producer Larry Weinstein's upcoming documentary Inside Hana's Suitcase, a remarkable Holocaust story about how Hana Brady's suitcase forever changed the lives of Hana's brother, George Brady, in Toronto and Fumiko Ishioka in Tokyo.

Goodman, a Juno Award winner, also records with smaller ensembles such as the Mirage Quintet, which includes violinist Jacques Israelievitch, former Toronto Symphony Orchestra concertmaster, and flutist Robert Aiken of the New Music Group Ensemble. They are currently finishing an album. "It's mostly French impressionist music. It's like listening to a Monet painting – it's brushstrokes, perfume, theme and colour," she said.

Erica Goodman

Other CDs on which Goodman plays are also to be released. They include a tribute album for contemporary composer Elliot Carter's 100th birthday, on which she plays with Aiken, and an album of Canadian composer Marjan Mozetich's works. On it, Goodman accompanies cellist Coenraad Bloemendal on Reflections Romantic Duets for Cello and Harp.

Goodman, along with Temple Sinai's Cantor Gershon Silins and concert saxophonist Daniel Rubinoff, performs the music of Leonard Bernstein and Kurt Weill at Temple Sinai on Nov. 28 at 8:00 pm, in memory of Goodman's friend and colleague, the trumpeter Paul Brody.

"The last project I did with Paul was an album of pieces he dearly loved. They're beautiful melodies, very accessible," said Goodman of Bel Canto, her upcoming CD featuring Brody playing the music of George Gershwin, a West Side Story medley, Kol Nidrei and Ave Maria.

Goodman's upcoming concerts include an appearance with the Amadeus Choir for a Christmas concert on Dec. 13, and she performs Canadian composer Chris Paul Harman's harp concerto with the Esprit Orchestra at the Jane Mallett Theatre on May 1, 2009.

A biting satire on Hollywood's movie industry

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Barry Levinson's biting satire on the Hollywood film industry, What Just Happened, which opens in Toronto on Oct. 31, is mercilessly amusing.

The film's central character, Ben (Robert De Niro), a harried Jewish producer, is desperately trying to mollify a conceited director and satisfy a hard-as-nails studio boss as he attempts to reconcile with his ex-wife.

Although Ben, played with effortless panache by De Niro, is one of Hollywood's most powerful players, he instinctively knows when to be accommodating.

Jeremy (Michael Wincott), the temperamental British director he is working with on a film starring the real-life Sean Penn, goes ballistic when Lou (Catherine Keener), the studio president, orders him to modify the unacceptably violent ending. In an uproarious scene, Jeremy, sporting a "chai" tattoo in Hebrew letters on his neck, rants and raves in reaction to her take-it-or-leave-it edict.

Ben, accustomed to egotistical outbursts from his prickly associates, calms him down and assures Lou that the revisions will be made so that the movie can be screened at the forthcoming Cannes festival. In another comical sequence, Ben is called upon to convince a stubborn, self-absorbed actor (Bruce Willis) to shave his beard for a new project.

As these zany developments unfold, Ben, living alone since his divorce from Kelly, his second wife (Robin Wright Penn), discovers that he longs for her embrace and that he needs further therapy to ease the shock of the separation.

As if he does not have enough on his plate, Ben flies into a rage upon finding out that a colleague (Stanley Tucci) is secretly sleeping with Kelly, and that his daughter from his first marriage is not as sexually innocent as he imagined.

For Jewish viewers, perhaps, Levinson throws in two Israeli characters who converse in rapid-fire Hebrew.

Levinson handles these situations quite adeptly, skilfully integrating Ben's stressful movie career with his convoluted personal life.

In Levinson's hands, Hollywood is shark pool, a Darwinian cutthroat town where friendship is merely a word and the bottom line is everything.

TEATRON PRESENTS AN AMERICAN MUSICAL ABOUT ISRAEL

Teatron Toronto Jewish Theatre presents A Glimpse of the Light, Ben Finn's musical love story spanning the events leading to the birth of Israel, from illegal immigration to life on a kibbutz, as told by a group of Holocaust survivors.

Director Ari Weisberg calls the musical a "historical romance" and notes that it has been well received in various previous productions in New York and across the United States. "I was taken by this gripping story of human travel both in space and emotions," he said. "The heroes of this musical leave behind not only their hometowns and country, but families and a way of life that were destroyed. Would they be able to find new life and a new family in their new country?"

The music is an eclectic blend of styles: Eastern European (shtetl), Israeli and American 1940s-style pop. The production features eight original dance routines. Cast members include Jack Ossof, Gloria Valentine and eight others.

Teatron's production, the first outside the United States, is at the Leah Posluns Theatre, Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, 4588 Bathurst St. Nov. 12 to 23. $22 to $44. 416-781-5527. www. teatrontheatre.com

The Photographer gets inside the doomed Lodz ghetto

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The Photographer, a Polish documentary about the Lodz ghetto, will be screened on Monday, Nov. 3 at 7 p.m. at the Cineplex Odeon Sheppard Grande theatre as part of Holocaust Education Week.

Admission is free, but pre-registration is required and can be obtained by calling 416-635-2883, extension 5286.

Dariusz Jabolnski's film is extraordinary in every respect, from its providence to its contents.

Twenty one years ago, 400 colour slides, taken by Walter Genewein, the Nazis' chief accountant in the ghetto, were found in a second-hand book shop in Vienna. Genewein's slides amount to an insider's view of the ghetto, which was liquidated in August 1944.

Genewein, an avid amateur photographer of Austrian Catholic descent, had access to every corner of the ghetto and snapped an amazing variety of photographs of everyday life there.

Thanks to these invaluable slides, an on-camera interview with a Jewish doctor who witnessed events there, and testimony from Germans who knew what was going on in Lodz, Jablonski draws a nuanced portrait of the ghetto.

Chaim Rumkowski

The ghetto, housing more than 300,000 Jews, was converted into one giant workshop that produced goods for the German army. The ghetto's administrator, Chaim Rumkowski, believed that he could save Jewish lives by meeting German production quotas.

For several years, the arrangement worked. The chief German representative in the ghetto, Hans Biebow, a former coffee importer, was satisfied with the ghetto's industriousness.

Yet even during this period, deportations took place and hunger and disease were rampant, as the film suggests.

In fact, the Nazis regarded the ghetto as a "temporary solution," since their ultimate objective was to murder its Jewish inhabitants, whom one Nazi functionary compared to a deadly plague.

Genewein arrived in Lodz in the winter of 1940 and stayed to the bitter end. He seems to have been an efficient and conscientious bureaucrat, but he was coldly indifferent to the terrible conditions under which Jews laboured. His slides, at once simple and unaffected, are chillingly powerful.

The testimony by the Jewish doctor, Arnold Mostowicz, is clinical. He recalls terrible odours, the sight of people wrapped in rags and paper and German roundups.

He thinks that Rumkowski – a controversial figure in the annals of the Holocaust – simply had no choice when he acceded to Nazi orders to deport children, as well as the sick and the elderly.

There was "no escape" from German decisions, he says with resignation in a weary voice, adding that Jews preferred not to know the awful truth.

When the ghetto was finally liquidated, 68,000 Jews were sent to Nazi death camps, while 870 Jews were left behind to "clean it up."

As these roundups occurred, Genewein, the bureaucrat and photographer, bought his wife a diamond ring, presumably confiscated from a Jewish deportee. It appears that the mass murder of Jews did not bother him in the least.

Such was the moral climate in which the Holocaust unfolded, and The Photographer captures this mood perfectly.

Lies about my Nazi father

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

2 or 3 Things I Know About Him, due to be presented by the Toronto Jewish Film Society on Nov. 2 during Holocaust Education Week, packs quite a punch.

Malte Ludin's 85-minute documentary is a portrait of his father, Hanns, a Nazi war criminal hanged after Germany's defeat in World War II.

Ludin, a German, describes his film as the story of a son trying to clear up the "unpleasant truth" about his dad.

Hanns Ludin, an early supporter of the Nazi party, was an admirer of Adolf Hitler, claiming that his goals were great and that his motives were pure.

Joining the party in 1930, a full three years before Hitler was appointed chancellor, Ludin was arrested for his political activities on behalf of the Nazis. Following his release from prison, he joined the SA brownshirts.

Ludin then joined the the foreign office, and in 1943, he was appointed Germany's ambassador to Slovakia, the fascist, anti-Semitic republic aligned with Germany.

As part of his duties, Ludin signed deportation orders that sent thousands of Slovak Jews to labour and concentration camps.

Arrested after the war and extradited to what was then Czechoslovakia, Ludin was executed on Dec. 9, 1947.

In the film, topics ranging from memory to guilt are explored at length. Interviewees include the filmmaker's mother, Erla, and his sisters.

What emerges from these interviews is Hanns Ludin's conviction that he committed no crimes and that he was merely following orders.

His daughters have fond memories of him, one saying she had a happy childhood while her father was still alive and another one claiming he was not a war criminal.

The truth, of course, is more complex, and Ludin's son deals with these issues with unflinching honesty as his film unfolds.

2 or 3 Things I Know About Him strips away lies and half-truths and leaves us with a picture of a deeply conflicted family.

In short, this is a courageous film by a painfully honest filmmaker.

Hanns Ludin

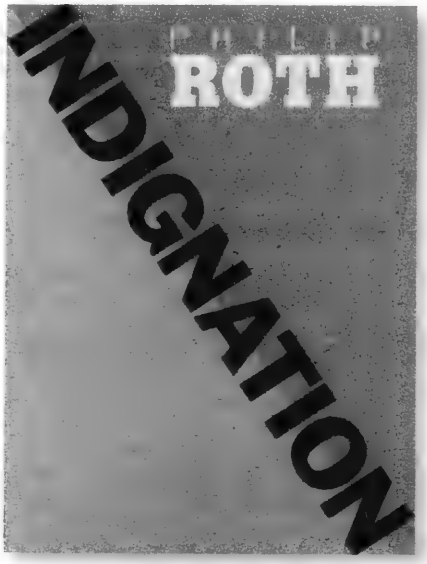
Philip Roth returns to the American heartland

By NORMAN RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

Philip Roth's Indignation can be read as an antiwar novel, an indirect attack on U.S. President George W. Bush's America, and at war indefinitely. Roth places the action of Indignation in 1951, when a young man lacking an education deferment could be called for service on the Korean front, where thousands of American were dying in Chinese offensives.

Norman Ravvin

Roth's narrator is Marcus Gessner, a college-age, New Jersey-raised son of a kosher butcher, who tries to escape his father's watchful eye by enrolling at idyllic "Winesburg, a small liberal arts and engineering college in the farm country of north central Ohio." Winesburg represents to Marcus all that is safe, secure and "square" about the home front, though his year is haunted by the threat of death on a battlefield far away.



Indignation (Viking Canada) might be considered a dark second act to Roth's breakthrough fiction of 50 years ago, the brilliant novella Goodbye, Columbus, which opposed downtown Jewish Newark to the lives of suburban strivers who could afford nose jobs for their daughters and the cost of sending their sons to Ohio State. In that early work, the key themes are young love and the suburban-urban divide in postwar Jewish life. Indignation is a novel of death and madness. Crisply paced, itself a short work built of cinematic scenes, Indignation, like Roth's recent Everyman, hurtles toward death as the final inevitable fact.

Marcus, in the tumultuous year of his life that Roth describes for us, thinks of himself as a kind of dupe, an unknowing victim of chance and error. He makes decisions that, with hindsight, make little sense, and indignation, a rage for principled action, contributes to his undoing.

Marcus is among Roth's most extreme characters. There is humour in Indignation, but it is resolutely dark, as in the conclusion of an argument that breaks out when Winesburg's dean invites Marcus into his office: "I vomited then, though luckily not onto the dean or his desk. Head down, I robustly vomited onto the rug. Then, when I tried to avoid the rug, I vomited onto the chair in which I'd been sitting and, when I spun away from the chair, vomited onto the glass of one of the framed photographs hanging on the dean's wall, the one of the Winesburg undefeated championship football team of 1924."

In Indignation, even sex, a source of humour in much of Roth's fiction, is linked with death. Marcus' object of desire at Winesburg is the elusive Olivia Hutton, on whose wrist he notices the telltale "gash" of a suicide attempt. Drawing a wilfully perverse connection between this and his father's trade, Marcus considers "what Olivia had tried to do, to kill herself according to kosher specifications by emptying her body of blood. Had she been successful, had she expertly completed the job with a single perfect slice of the blade, she would have rendered herself kosher in accordance with rabbinical law. Olivia's telltale scar came from attempting to perform her own ritual slaughter."

Even college life, so idyllically evoked in Goodbye, Columbus, breaks down into bizarre violence, as naive pranks in the midst of a record-breaking snowstorm end with "drunken boys, their garments, their hands, their crew-cut hair, their faces smeared blue-black with ink and crimson with blood." This is the home front as carnival, unknowingly making itself ready for the horrors of the enemy assault on a "spiny ridge in central Korea," where the novel shudders to a halt.

Indignation provides breathless, eye-opening reading. It is a vital burlesque of youth and the waste of war. As a bookend to the shelf of work that Roth began with Goodbye, Columbus, it is among the finest writing about post-World War II America.

Norman Ravvin's books include the story collection Sex, Skyscrapers and Standard Yiddish and A House of Words: Jewish Writing, Identity and Memory. He is chair of the Concordia University Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies.

Winnipegger sees 30 MLB games in 30 parks

By HARVEY ROSEN
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — It's a fantasy shared by many baseball fans – to travel around North America to see a game in every Major League city.

For most, the dream never becomes a reality.

But south Winnipeg resident Matthew Leibl's wish came true when he departed the Manitoba capital on June 16 for an 11-week coast-to-coast visit of all 30 big league ballparks.

Matthew Leibl

The 2003 graduate of Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate, Winnipeg's Jewish high school, fulfilled his aspirations for the most part.

Unfortunately, fate didn't co-operate completely.

"I had been saving for the trip for several years," the 23-year-old said. "Since I was 10, my zaida and I talked about taking the trip together. It was a childhood dream."

Leibl's grandfather, Harold Pollock, was a respected teacher and administrator in the Winnipeg School Division.

"One day in March, my grandfather phoned and told me he was very sick, but I should still plan on taking the baseball trip and that I should go for both of them. I knew when I set out that it was 99 per cent that he wouldn't be there when I returned," Leibl said.

"Almost three weeks into my trip, on July 1, he died. I interrupted my travels and flew in from Toronto to be at the funeral. Several days later, I returned and continued on from that point."

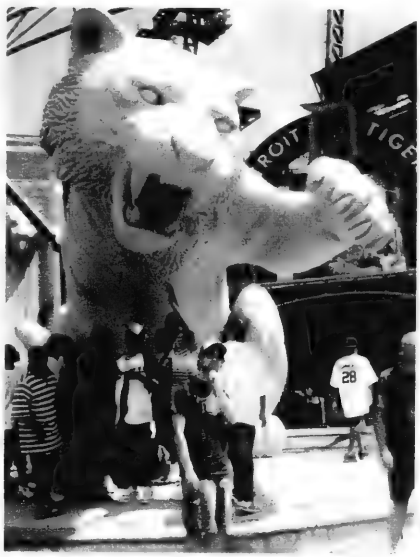
How did Leibl, who played baseball for 10 years up to midget level and who describes himself as "a weak hitter and pretty good fielder," manage to co-ordinate a trip so complicated that it might lead a travel agent to drink?

"It took real hard-core planning that started in February," he said. "I stared at the schedules on my computer, and finally, after several days, I came up with a route that worked. Then it became an issue to find places to stay.

"I was traveling all alone and I didn't have a car. I used public transit in the cities and took buses, trains, and planes. I figured that I could stay in hostels or cheaper hotels, but even that would cost a lot of money."

Leibl networked with friends and relatives, asking who might know other people in the American cities who would offer lodging to a certified baseball nut for a night or two.

Before long, the hotel and hostel businesses lost a potential customer. Matthew the Magician batted .961 in managing to locate accommodation on 74 of 77 nights.



Matthew Leibl outside Comerica Park, home of the Detroit Tigers.

Several of this hosts on the road were rabbis who were contacted by Rabbi Larry Pinsker of Shaarey Zedek Synagogue.

"I worked as the assistant cantor on the bimah for three years," Leibl said of his connection to the shul. "Every Saturday, I would read from the Torah. I also taught about a dozen students at any given time their Maftirs, plus a host of other duties."

Leibl is also well known to the Shaarey Zedek sisterhood, which invited him to be the main speaker for their opening function on Sept. 18. On that evening, he shared the story of his baseball journey with a crowd of about 60.

Seeing the various teams was, of course, the highlight of the trip. As for tickets, Leibl said that with the exception of the all-star game in July and two games at Yankee Stadium, for which he bought seats in advance, he managed to purchase the others at the gate or from scalpers.

He also took a few side trips to the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame ad Museum in Cleveland and the Baseball Hall of Fame in Cooperstown, N.Y.

Leibl discovered that despite travelling alone, fans at the ballparks were always friendly, since they all speak the language of baseball. He was even fortunate to retrieve a baseball hit into the stands at an Arizona Diamondbacks game in Phoenix.

In Pittsburgh, he met and had his photo taken with former Pittsburgh Pirates star catcher Manny Sanguillen, who today works a barbecue stand in front of the stadium.

Leibel – who says he loves baseball more than any other sport because of its tradition, history, and statistics – was only back in Winnipeg for a short stay. Earlier this month, he headed to Halifax, where he will work for the Atlantic Jewish Council, the local Jewish federation.

Maher pokes the beehive

ALMOST FAMOUS

BY JACOB MEDJUCK

U.S. comedian Bill Maher first came into my life via his popular late night talk show Politically Incorrect. It's good fun to watch famous people stuff their fancy feet into their surgically perfect-smile mouths and oversimplify complicated topical issues of every kind.

His on-the-spot craftsmanship of language and inciting political comedy is truly a stylized art, one that he's perfected. The man paints with a political brush, dabbing and jabbing bright stokes on the TV canvas, and as such, he's definitely an artist.

Most paintings increase in value when the artist dies. So, if you have an old 2003 DVD of Bill Maher: Be More Cynical, you're in for a minor windfall this year when the always-entertaining comic gets shot by one of the subjects of his latest film, Religulous.

This documentary is sharply funny. I'm sure that I'll even see it again. But let's not be fooled: the film is directed by Larry Charles, who directed the blockbuster hit Borat, and should be appreciated as well-crafted storytelling. It's about "story," not necessarily objective fact.

But try telling that to Maher's subjects, most of whom are religious fanatics – of all faiths.

Maher repeatedly pokes his fingers into a beehive of Islamic and Christian fundamentalists, and the results are absolutely hilarious. But as I watched him tickle this rattlesnake, I wondered at what personal risk was he doing so? Fanatics, after all, are labelled as such for a reason. They should wear signs reading: "Caution – fanatics at work. Do not feed the fanatics."

Maher stomps all over the norms of courtesy, asking the toughest questions. He folds religious people like origami with his quick wit until they find themselves eating their own sandals.

I have to say that Jews got off the lightest. Yet he didn't seem to be pulling punches – not for his Jewish director, Jewish producers, Jewish financiers or Jewish distributors, or even for his mother, who is also Jewish.

Maher, the product of a Jewish mother and Catholic father, preached what he describes as militant atheism: the need for active atheism in American politics and the world. His thesis is that religion has brought more conflict than order to the world, and that people should stand up for nothing. Literally.

I won't spoil the details of the film and reveal which religions get what flavour of pie in their faces, but I did take away one lingering fact.

Mid-film, Maher held up a population chart of planet Earth. Apparently, the Earth has 14 million Jews. (That's a lot of latkes to make – and more if we each take two.)

The world also has nearly one billion Muslims. That's one billion Muslims and 14 million Jews.

I'll put that in perspective:

The world is roughly .014 per cent Heeb, which means there are fewer Jews in the world than the allowable amount of arsenic in Perrier. There are fewer Jews than the amount of rat poop that's legally permissible in a box of cereal.

We are, mathematically, but the tiniest volume of rat poop in a beverage the size of Muslim planet Earth.

It's humbling and terrifying.

His intention was clearly to promote a human race, and not a humanity of competing races, and to urge us to take the frictional energy we waste at the borders of our faiths and use it more productively.

The movie is informative, entertaining and daring, but it's also only a glossy and edited piece of investigation. And while there's always truth in art – art is a gesture of life, a comment – it should only encourage discussion, not assassination.

So Maher should be fine.

That is, unless the film is released on DVD with a cover image of Muhammad, in which case late fees would quickly become the least of his concerns.

MEDITERRANEAN COUSCOUS SALAD

- 3 tbls. olive oil, +1/4 c
- 1 lb. Israeli couscous
- juice of 2 lemons
- 1/2 tsp salt
- 1/4 c dried cranberries
- 1/2 c chopped fresh mint leaves
- 1/4 c slivered almonds, toasted
- 2 cloves garlic, minced
- 3 c chicken stock
- 1 lemon, zested
- 1/2 tsp ground black pepper
- 1 c chopped fresh basil leaves

Warm 3 tbls. olive oil over medium heat in saucepan. Add garlic; cook for 1 min. Add couscous; cook until toasted and lightly browned, stirring often, about 5 min. Carefully add stock, juice of 1 lemon; bring to a boil. Reduce heat and simmer, covered, until couscous is tender, but still firm to the bite, stirring occasionally, about 8-10 min. Drain couscous. In large bowl, toss cooked couscous with remaining olive oil and lemon juice, zest, salt, pepper and let cool. Once couscous is room temperature, add herbs, dried cranberries, and almonds. Toss to combine and serve.

A Family Business for over 60 Years

Not as hard as you think

FITNESS CORNER

BY FELYCE ZOMPARELLI

I know how hard it is to balance business and family life as well as find the energy and time to eat right, get enough sleep and exercise as we should.

I'm here to tell you it is not as hard as you think. If you keep some simple rules in mind, daily exercise can be an incredibly rewarding experience.

Set short- and long-term goals, make sure they are achievable, start small and move up. You always get motivated when you accomplish something. Move every day for 30 minutes, even if it is just walking up and down your stairs at home consistently for those 30 minutes. Repeated behaviours become habits, and everyone can find 30 minutes in a day to create a positive habit.

Put variety into your workouts – buy a new workout tape, bike instead of walk, join a community exercise class, alternate between resistance and cardio training, or hire a personal trainer to spice up your home workouts.

Book yourself an appointment to work out and keep it – book your day around it. Be honest with yourself and book a good time that works for you. For example, if you know you are always tired at the end of the day, don't schedule your workout at that time. Use your lunch hour or wake up 30 minutes earlier to get your exercise in every day.

Stretch often. Stretching helps improve flexibility, circulation and muscle repair, which are important for overall fitness.

Monitor your progress on paper – it's a great way to motivate yourself. It gives you a fast visual record of the results you are getting, which helps keep you on track. You will not only find that you have more energy, you will also accomplish more with your day and feel fantastic doing it. So go on, set yourself a goal, write it down, look at it often and just do it.

Winnipeg rabbi served in the marines, navy

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Rabbi Karen Soria, the first female rabbi ever to have served in the United States Marines, is the new spiritual leader of Temple Shalom, a Reform congregation in the city.

Rabbi Soria, who served in the marines from 1992 to 1996, was also the second female rabbi to serve in the U.S. Navy, a position she held from 1992 to 2003.

She was Australia's first female rabbi and served with congregations in Melbourne from 1981 to 1989.

Rabbi Soria arrived in Winnipeg a year before taking over the pulpit at Temple Shalom.

Rabbi Karen Soria
[R. Spivak photo]

"My partner in the armed forces was transferred here a little over a year ago." Rabbi Soria told the Jewish Post and News.

She told The CJN that as rabbi of Temple Shalom, she would be willing to perform same-sex marriages.

Rabbi Soria predicted that the temple's congregation will grow because the shul's services "have the best [live] music that touches people's souls and we have such diversity and are open to such diversity."

One of her areas of interest is working with people who choose Judaism as adults, she said.

Growing up near Chicago, Rabbi Soria graduated from the Hebrew Union College in 1981. After serving as a rabbi in Australia, she was the rabbi for two congregations in Florida.

She then decided to enlist in the U.S. Navy as a chaplain. "A friend convinced me that this would be a good thing to do. I chose the navy because the navy's application was on the top and the navy was the fastest getting back to me," she said.

In 2003, Rabbi Soria said that she was ready to get out of the navy and "got an honourable discharge."

While in the navy, Rabbi Soria met a number of Jews "who weren't at morning High Holiday services because they didn't feel comfortable asking their commanding officer to take off work. I had an overwhelming sense of duty to those people to pray on behalf of them," she said.

"This was a defining moment. It can be very difficult to be Jewish in the U.S. forces, and some people that I knew were not confident to observe [Jewish holy days] as otherwise they would have liked to."

She remembers one Jewish sailor who said that one of the reasons he was estranged from the Jewish community was because he was a sailor. "He said, 'What Jewish parent ever wants their kid to be a sailor?'

"[It made me realize] that as a community, we have less tolerance than we should of the very different ways that people can work productively."

Rabbi Soria said that her synagogue will be starting a chesed committee and an adult education committee.

In addition to acting as a part-time rabbi for the Temple Shalom congregation, she will work part time as the Jewish chaplain at the Health Sciences Centre.

LEST WE FORGET

The remarkably detailed Shalom memorial window at the Ben Weider JCC in Montreal expresses gratitude and appreciation for the sacrifices of the members of the Jewish community who served in the Canadian Armed Forces during World War II. On the eve of Remembrance Day, we publish an essay by Jewish studies scholar Barbara Weiser, who explains the window's origins and significance. Please see page 9.

Israel's new envoy presents credentials

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAW— Miriam Ziv is the first female ambassador of Israel to Canada, just one of many "firsts" she has experienced in her career.

Upon entering Israel's foreign ministry in 1972, following her studies in English linguistics and political science at Tel Aviv University, Ziv was considered to be the "pioneer" woman cadet. She was later the first deputy director general (for Africa), and has generally been breaking the glass ceiling throughout her career.

Not only has Ziv been a trailblazer in the number of "female firsts" in her career, she has also managed to do so without sacrificing her family life.

"I am a very atypical diplomat," she said in a recent interview. "I spent more time in Israel than abroad."

She and her husband, retired diplomat Ariel Kenet, are the parents of twin sons, now 24, who have remained in Israel to continue their studies.

"I decided to pattern my life according to my sons. It never hindered my career. I could allow them stability, which was very important to me. They were seven when we left for Rome and we returned to Israel for their bar mitzvah. The boys went to high school in Israel."

The posting to Rome in 1991 was an exciting time for Ziv. She was No. 3 at the embassy, her husband No. 2. Ziv's responsibility was to be the contact with the Vatican. In that role, she said, "we managed to reach an agreement with the Holy See and establish relations… a very special thing," she said.

Ziv has been in Ottawa for less than two months, but her arrival was like a homecoming of sorts. Her first foreign posting, in 1974,

Kent In Cabinet

TORONTO — Former broadcast journalist Peter Kent, the newly elected Tory MP in what is believed to be Canada's most Jewish riding, was named to a junior cabinet post last week. The MP from suburban Thornhill – which has an estimated 32,000 Jews, comprising one-third of the riding – was named minister of state of foreign affairs (Americas) in Prime Minister Stephen Harper's new cabinet. In the Oct. 14 election, Kent beat Liberal Susan Kadis, who had been the riding's MP since 2004.

Quebecer Woos Livni

MONTREAL — A Quebec man tried to woo Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni with an 18-carat gold diamond ring, Ynetnews reported. Laurent Belanger couriered the ring, along with a photo of himself, to Livni with a note written on personal stationery that read, "I am aware of what I'm doing." Livni's security opened the package cautiously, fearing a bomb. Livni, 50, who is married with two adult sons, told her staff to send the gift back with thanks.

Israeli Firm Gets $

WATERLOO, Ont. — An Israeli software maker is one of three firms to receive the first major investments from the $150-million BlackBerry Partners Fund, a venture capital pool that helps developers create software for smart phones like the BlackBerry. Lod-based WorldMate Inc. – which was formed in 2000 and makes travel software that lets people check weather and book hotels on their Blackberry – will get $8 million. Two U.S. firms, Buzzd and Digby, will get $3.2 million and $5.5 million, respectively. The fund was set up last May by RBC Venture Partners, Thomson Reuters, JLA Ventures, and Research in Motion, which makes the BlackBerry.

Oldest Rockette Dies

TORONTO — The world's oldest living Rockette, a Jewish woman from Paris, Ont., died Oct. 16 in Toronto at age 97. Jeanette Heller moved to New York in the early 1930s to join the troupe at Radio City Music Hall that became the Rockettes. After 11 years, the 5-foot, 4-inch dancer came back to Toronto to care for her mother during World War II. She later returned to New York, where she was a dancer and producer. She came back to Canada in 1975. She never married or had children, the Toronto Star reported.

Agriprocessors Arrest

POSTVILLE, Iowa — The ex-manager of the kosher meatpacker Agriprocessors was arrested on charges related to the hiring of illegal workers. Sholom Rubashkin allegedly conspired to harbour illegal immigrants at the Agriprocessors plant in Postville, Iowa. U.S. immigration officials also say he abetted the use of fake identification documents and identity theft. Rubashkin is the highest-ranking company official to face criminal charges stemming from the May 12 federal immigration raid at the company's Postville plant, when more than one-third of the firm's workforce was arrested. Nathan Lewin, an attorney who represents Rubashkin's father, company owner Aaron Rubashkin, dismissed the arrest as unnecessary and motivated by federal law enforcement's desire for good publicity. The arrest came a day after Iowa's state labour regulatory body announced it would levy nearly $10 million in fines against the company for alleged labour infractions.

Dubin Remembered For Johnson Inquiry

TORONTO — Charles Dubin, the former chief justice of Ontario who headed a royal commission into drug use in amateur sports in the wake of the Ben Johnson scandal, died Oct. 27 of pneumonia in Toronto. He was 87.

The Hamilton-born Dubin, who was renowned as one of the country's top lawyers, was appointed to the Ontario Court of Appeal, the province's top court, in 1973. He became chief justice in 1990, staying on until 1996, when he rejoined his old law firm, Torys. He was named an officer of the Order of Canada in 1997.

Dubin also headed a 1981 royal commission into airline safety that recommended more stringent safety measures, and he headed one of two inquiries into baby deaths at Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children.

But he is perhaps best remembered for heading the 1989 royal commission on doping in amateur sports – known as the Dubin Inquiry – which was convened after Johnson lost his Olympic gold medal in the 100-metre sprint at the 1988 Seoul games when he tested positive for steroids.

In 1944, he married his wife, Anne, who was also a lawyer. She died last year. The couple had no children.

ADL Helps Foil Plot

NEW YORK — The Anti-Defamation League said it helped secure the arrests of white supremacists who allegedly plotted to kill Barack Obama. The ADL, which tracks hate groups, gave U.S. federal agents details on Daniel Cowart, 21, of Jackson, Tenn., and Paul Schlesselman, 18, of West Helena, Ark. The men allegedly planned to kill 88 blacks and Obama, the Democratic presidential candidate. The ADL was familiar with them partly because of Cowart's links to the Supreme White Alliance, a group the ADL monitors.

Jews, Somalis launch mentoring program

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Its proponents didn't quite bill it as a light unto the nation, but they came pretty close.

Last week, representatives of Jewish and Somali community organizations announced a joint mentorship program that they suggested could serve as a model of ethnic cooperation for other Canadians.

Spokespeople for Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Canadian Somali Congress (CSC) gathered at Kipling Collegiate Institute in the city's west end to announce the partnership. The project was initiated under the auspices of the Canadian International Peace Project (CIPP), one of whose governors, law professor Ed Morgan, is past president of CJC and an honourary patron of the CSC.

"The Jewish-Somali project presents a paradigm shift in our approach to multiculturalism wherein two very different and diverse groups are working together to assist in building stronger communities," said Mark Persaud, president and CEO of CIPP. "For Canada to avoid the serious problems of integration of diaspora communities as currently being experienced by European and other countries, it is imperative that as Canadians we exercise bold and innovative leadership to promote greater social cohesion. The CIPP is providing such important leadership."

The Jewish-Somali Project launched last week at a Toronto high school. Announcing the initiative were, from left, James Morton, Mark Persaud, Bernie Farber, Howard English and Digal Haio.

Howard English, vice-president of corporate communications for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, called the program "a breakthrough" and said the initiative represented an example of Canadian values at work at a time when "strife is taking place around the world."

The initiative could serve as "a role model" for other Canadians, while permitting the Jewish community to "give back... by helping other communities facing the challenges we did decades ago." It also marked the "first formalized relationship between two such diverse communities," he said.

Bernie Farber, CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress, said "in no other place in the universe could it happen.

"Many Canadians might be surprised the Muslim and Jewish communities are coming together for this project, because often when we talk about the issues, sadly it

Elections here and there

From the editor's desk

Once again, on the eve of an important election, this time in the United States, we advise our readers that this issue of The CJN went to press on Monday, Nov. 3, one day before the election.

We will, of course, provide coverage of the results of the American presidential elections in the next issue of the paper.

As these words are being written, two days before the voting, the autumn air below the border can be observed to virtually crackle with election electricity.

Last stop rallies by the candidates attract thousands; vast spaces in the weekend newspapers are filled with election stories; television and radio pundits nearly fall over themselves to get the last word predicting results; and even the Sunday football games were felt by some to have been a distraction rather than a relief from the final, frenzied campaigning.

What cannot be denied about the soon-to-end, seemingly endless campaign is that it has generated a great deal of interest and energy among American voters. Indeed, the turnout at many advance polls in various states has been reported to have thus far surpassed any such early polling in the past.

Alas, and to our obvious embarrassment, the same observation cannot be made about the Canadian federal election of Oct. 14.

Only 59.1 per cent of eligible Canadian voters actually voted. Some 13.8 million out of a possible 23.4 million voters took the time and made the effort to mark their ballot. This figure represents the lowest percentage of eligible voter turnout ever in Canadian history.

Anyone who cares about preserving and strengthening the deep sinews that sustain Canadian democracy should be alarmed at this shockingly low voter turnout.

Far more alarming, however, is the fact that the low turnout appears to be part of a trend that has taken root in the past number of years.

Prior to this year's election, the lowest ever election turnout – 60.9 per cent of eligible voters – occurred merely two elections ago in 2004. Some 64.7 per cent of eligible voters voted in the election two years ago, in 2006.

The two federal elections in the '90s attracted nearly 70 per cent of eligible voters. The three elections in the '80s attracted 69, 75 and 75 per cent respectively. In the '70s, the elections drew about 75 per cent, and during the '60s, turnout was as high as 79 per cent.

The number of actual voters as a percentage of eligible voters has been steadily, yet markedly, declining.

The question that must be asked is – why? Why are large numbers of eligible Canadian voters not bothering to vote?

The phenomenon of the non-voting Canadian – the apathetic four out of every 10 – must be studied and understood if the country's democratic institutions are to truly thrive.

With such a substantial number of non-voters, we cannot assume that those missing are young Canadians too busy or too uninterested to follow the traditional ways of the traditional parties or to support leaders with whom they do not or cannot connect. It was not only the youth of Canada who did not vote last month.

It is, therefore, a situation that should concern all Canadians.

One group of voters that it seems safe to say was not apathetic in the Canadian election, and that it is certainly safe to say is not apathetic in the American election, is the Jews.

Jews tend to get involved in relatively large numbers and we vote in large numbers. This has been the case in every society since even before civic and constitutional rights were conferred upon Jews. The well-being and good governance of the state in which Jews have resided have always been a central concern for its Jewish citizens.

Like Jewish communities around the world, the community in the United States has demonstrated that it is neither monolithic nor homogenous in its political affiliations.

As in Canadian elections, but even more so due to the global significance of American foreign policy, the candidates' respective policies on Israel attract a great deal of Jewish interest and attention. The JTA recently published an article that lists the identities of the advisors who might be most instrumental in formulating Israel-related policies.

Some of Barack Obama's top advisors are said to be:

• Dennis Ross, "who played a lead role in peace talks during the first Bush and Clinton presidencies";

• Anthony Lake, "Clinton's first national security adviser"; and

• Daniel Kurtzer, the former ambassador to Egypt and then to Israel.

Some of John McCain's top advisors are said to be:

• Senator Joe Lieberman, whom McCain has said would be one of his "top foreign policy advisors";

• James Woolsey, who, "like Lieberman, is one of a small army of 'Scoop' Jackson Democrats" (those who support a strong international presence for the United States); and

Irrespective of the outcome of the American election, history will be made. –MBD

THE MURDER OF A PRIME MINISTER

On Nov. 4, 1995, Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin was assassinated by Yigal Amir. Rabin had just participated in a massive peace rally in the main square of Tel Aviv in which he reiterated his determination to carry forward with the peace process. Amir was opposed to negotiations with the Palestinians and shot Rabin in the back as the prime minister was walking to his car. Ironically the theme of the rally was "Yes to Peace, No to Violence." The photo is of Rabin's funeral on Mount Herzl in Jerusalem. [Israel photo]

Abella links Holocaust, battle for human rights

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Canadian Supreme Court justice Rosalie Silberman Abella declared last week that the best way to pay tribute to Holocaust survivors is to ensure that the battle for global human rights is won.

Abella, who was born in a displaced persons camp in Germany to Holocaust survivors, said that democratic values must be promoted to prevent injustice and further atrocities.

Holocaust Education Week

The first Jewish woman to be appointed to the Supreme Court, she delivered her comments during Holocaust Education Week at a forum under the auspices of the Holocaust Centre of Toronto and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Addressing a capacity audience at Beth Sholom Synagogue, the 62-year-old jurist spoke in measured tones, but momentarily choked up with emotion toward the close of her speech.

Observing that the Holocaust left a "searing imprint in our collective consciousness" and ushered in modern human rights law, Abella said that the world must do everything in its power to prevent genocide.

Rosalie Abella

Abella – whose brother was murdered in Treblinka and whose father was the only person in his family to survive the Holocaust – spoke of the importance of upholding the values of democracy, decency, integrity and compassion in a universe where the most basic forms of human rights are constantly flouted.

Despite the enactment of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the convening of the Nuremberg war crimes trial in the wake of World War II, she noted lamentably, terrible abuses have occurred in places ranging from Rwanda to Darfur.

Warning that indifference to the plight of the oppressed leads to a denial of human rights and even genocide, Abella said that the promotion of democracy is essential to combat such developments. In too many corners of the globe, she mused, democratic values and tolerance are given short shrift.

In a blistering critique, Abella said that the international community appears to be reluctant to confront injustice. Yet silence in the face of injustice fosters intolerance, she warned.

Words of justice are not enough, she added, saying that democratic norms must be enforced.

Decrying the fact that the "never again" slogan has been continually disregarded since the Holocaust, she said this is inexplicable, unforgivable and an insult to Holocaust survivors.

Abella started her speech with a Yiddish phrase expressing pleasure to have been invited to Holocaust Education Week.

Saying she was moved by the size of the audience, Abella voiced pride at being a child of Holocaust survivors.

Abella said she is still in awe at the strength and tenacity of survivors who rebuilt their lives in Canada after the war.

Survivors, such as her own parents, were always grateful for the freedom Canada offered them.

In a brief survey of the events that led up to Kristallnacht 70 years ago this month, Abella suggested that the Holocaust was the end result of the world's indifference to the Nazi persecution of Jews.

Abella commented that the postwar generation has a moral obligation to keep alive the memory of Holocaust victims.

When glass shattered and Nazis laughed

Only to the very young does the reach of 70 years seem so far away as to be, essentially, beyond time. But even we who were born in the second half of the last century well understood by the occasional tears in our parents' eyes, that sometimes even 70 years could seem as yesterday, so fresh are the unhealed and unhealable wounds of memory.

Thus, it is with what for most of us is an entry in the history books but for some is still yesterday's horror: the memory of the frenzied pogrom of rioting, looting, hatred and murder by the Nazis against the Jews of Germany and Austria on Nov. 10, 1938.

In one ugly, horrific night, 267 synagogues were destroyed, 7,500 stores were ransacked, 30,000 Jewish men were sent to concentration camps and 91 Jews were killed.

Above the screams of terrified men, women and children, and the derisive laughter and taunting of the Nazi thugs, and the constant crackling of cinders from the bonfires of the pagan burning of holy books and other personal possessions of the humiliated Jews, one could hear throughout Germany the crash and splinter of the ubiquitous shattering of glass.

The synagogue in Baden-Baden burning

The Nazis themselves called that nightmarish night Kristallnacht, the night of shattered glass. Renowned historian Martin Gilbert has written of that name: "For the perpetrators of the destruction the name reflected their sense both of triumph and contempt: triumph at what they had destroyed, laugher at the thought of the sound of breaking glass." It is an unsavoury oddity of history that the name we use today to speak and write about that night is the one given to it by the howling, sadistic Nazis themselves.

Two days after the pogrom, Hitler fined all of German Jewry the sum of 1 billion Reichmarks for the damage caused to the state by the Nov. 10 disturbances. The money was collected, as Gilbert also wrote, "by the compulsory confiscation of 20 per cent of the property of every German Jew."

Three days later, Jewish children were prohibited from attending German schools.

The Nazi "excesses" of Nov. 10 and the ensuing decrees against the Jews finally opened the eyes of the international world to the violent, racist, xenophobic nature of the Nazis.

But even with eyes wide open, the world did not fully see and truly comprehend. That is why we recall that day 70 years ago as if it were yesterday. Because we do remember.

By a majority of 34 to 8, the faculty of the Jewish Theological Seminary voted to admit women to its rabbinical school. It was the only seminary in North America authorized to ordain Conservative rabbis at the time. The move stemmed from a 1979 report to the movement's Rabbinical Assembly, which recommended that women be admitted.

Debunking Arab myths

Kudos to Ed Morgan for realizing what a fool's game the Arab students are playing ("Live and learn: confessions of a Jewish professor," CJN, Oct. 23).

There is no way Morgan or any other pro-Israeli speaker could obtain a fair hearing at any "conference" by the pro-Palestinian groups on campus or elsewhere. Their purpose is to spread their myths and propaganda, and no sense of equity or fair play is part of their agenda. I have a suggestion for the students at York University and Morgan. Hold a conference on the same day and call it the "DAM" conference – "De-bunking Arab Myths".

For starters, let's look at the myth of the Palestinian refugee camps; second, the myth of Israeli apartheid; third, the myth that Israel should be a unitary state together with the Palestinian territories, and fourth, the myth started by former Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat that the Jews had no connection to Israel prior to 1948.

Morgan is, of course, correct when he argues for a separate conference. He is well aware of all these facts. The problem is, how do we get the message out?

We have to learn to fight lies with truth.

Recognizing Hamas not helpful

In "Change is needed" (CJN, Oct. 23), Jesse Mintz's main point is that Hamas speaks for the Palestinians, and therefore, they must be included to make any peace dialogue "legitimate." History offers an evident contrary "paradigm," to use Mintz's word. Hitler, for example, was also elected democratically. He, like Hamas, dismantled the foundations of democracy, ruled through terror and disregarded negotiated agreements with neighbours. Hitler was elected on a platform of "change" – he proceeded to change everything. Today, it is hard to find a German who will say that getting rid of Hitler and the Nazi party was bad for the German people. I hope that the day will soon come when the Palestinian Arabs will be free of Hamas and its ideology of hate. Recognizing the legitimacy of Hamas does not seem like the first step to that result.

Hungary doesn't deserve our support

This is with regard to the advertisement from the Hungarian Investment and Trade Development Agency ("Jorcajt and investment: rediscovering Jewish roots in Hungary," CJN, Oct. 23).

My parents were both born in Hungary and lost their parents, siblings and extended families in the war. My mother was in Auschwitz, and my father was in a forced labour camp. My father lived in a small town near Miskolc. His parents were rounded up and taken to the train station platform, and their gentile neighbours stood by, applauding.

I was very disappointed to see the concept of yahrzeit invoked in this context, on the day after I recited Yizkor for my mother in synagogue. As a matter of fact, the whole notion of promoting trade with Hungary under the pretext of promoting Judaism and Jewish values is more than slightly repugnant.

It is Jeno Freund's personal decision and right to offer himself as a token Jewish poster boy for the Hungarian government. The country that "once rejected them" as the advertisement so coyly mentions, does not deserve the support of the Jewish community, and especially not of those of us whose families suffered such losses because of the active complicity of the Hungarian people.

Montreal shul needs men for minyan

Temple Solomon (Bagg Street Shul), an Orthodox synagogue dating back to the 1920s, is the last remaining shul in the downtown area of Montreal. The shul holds weekly Sabbath services as it has for over 80 years, despite a great drop in attendance. If the synagogue is to keep up this tradition, more men are needed to attend Saturday in order to ensure we have a minyan. Services start at 9 a.m., the address is 3919 Clark St., one block south of Duluth Avenue, and the atmosphere is very relaxed, with a kiddush afterward. On a personal note, I attended services on Simchat Torah, and we had to wait an hour for a 10th man until one of the worshippers went out to drag somebody from their house. If you're ever in Montreal, please attend.

A unique monument to Canadian Jewish war veterans

By BARBARA WEISER

My many visits to synagogues, cemeteries and Jewish community centres across the country reveal a small number of memorials dedicated to Canadian Jewish war veterans.

There are wall plaques in some Jewish community centres in Western Canada and a few cenotaphs in Jewish cemeteries and parks across the country. But the most noteworthy examples of monuments devoted to the memory of Jewish Canadian war veterans are two stained glass windows – one at Holy Blossom Temple in Toronto and the other at the Ben Weider Jewish Community Centre in Montreal (formerly the YM-YWHA). (To complete the inventory, there is a Jewish star in the chancel at the church of St. Andrew and St. Paul in Montreal in memory of a veteran who served in the Black Watch in World War I, while at St. Matthew's United Church in Inverness, N.S., there are three stained glass windows memorializing Jewish war veterans from that community.)

It appears that Canadian Jewish communities have a preference for grave markers rather than artistic representations as monuments for reflection.

Before World War I, stained glass was promoted as one of the most permanent and beautiful ways to remember the sacrifice and gallantry of the men and women who gave their lives for their country. After World War II, Christian churches across Canada installed memorial windows honouring their congregants, including 41 in Montreal alone by stained glass artist William Kelsey.

Jews did not adopt the custom on a widespread basis.

The Jewish community immediately after the war was preoccupied with settling poor immigrants who were arriving from eastern Europe. In the book Canada's Jews: a People's Journey, Gerald Tulchinsky notes that about $3 million was spent on integrating some 46,000 Jewish immigrants who arrived in Canada between 1946 and 1960. Finding homes and schools for the new arrivals far outweighed the need to have esthetic memorials to Jewish veterans.

In this light, the Shalom window in the lobby of Montreal's JCC represents not only a lasting memorial for the 153 Y members who died in the war, but it's also a unique example of a community pooling its resources to create a memorial for future generations.

The building at 5500 Westbury Ave. in Montreal that houses the Shalom window was completed on May 14, 1950. The distinctive images and themes incorporated in the window match the commitment of the Y to the moral sensibilities of the Jewish community. The YM-YWHA, which runs Montreal's Jewish community centres, has linked generations of Jews in a secular Jewish manner. It provides recreational facilities that offer communal and educational programs which promote the social, cultural, recreational, physical and intellectual needs of its members.

During World War II, the Y offered outreach programs to support the war effort, and now the Shalom window holds a prominent place above the lobby, with the universal theme of "shalom" written in Hebrew script at its centre. The inscription on the top reads "shalom – peace – for our country and human freedom."

Hebrew lettering has a rich iconographic history and is considered to be a privileged object of meditation. Hebrew letters were God's vehicles for realizing His imagined universe. Around the margins of the windows are the insignias of various armed forces. The representation in the centre of an oversized chanukiyah has many interpretations, most commonly referring to the rededication of the Temple in Jerusalem during the Maccabee revolt in the second century CE.

Most Jews think of the chanukiyah in relation to the Chanukah story, in which the miracle of light helped transform a military triumph into a theological lesson on the power of faith and the miraculous acts of God. The story of Chanukah also relates to the struggle for national and religious freedom against overwhelming odds. The lower inscription reads, "Dedicated to our members who served in the armed forces 1939-1945."

The Shalom window was inaugurated in May 1953 and was funded by members of the Y, who made donations of not more than $100, enabling every member to participate. Children donated pennies from their allowances to help build it. The studio and designer are unknown, but judging from the Christian-style oil lamp on a pedestal and the rays of light emanating from behind the chanukiyah, it appears the artist was of Christian origin.

In June 2005, the window was rededicated and a memorial roll of names was added. The rededication was part of the the federal Department of Veteran Affairs' designation of 2005 as the Year of the Veteran, recalling the contributions and sacrifices of all Canadian veterans. The Y has a tradition of serving and remembering servicemen, and every year, it holds a memorial service for fallen soldiers that includes flag bearers, a candlelighting ceremony and representatives from the Jewish War Veterans of Canada, the Royal Canadian Legion, the B'nai Brith Maple Leaf Lodge, the Holocaust Resistance and Partisan Fighters, Jewish clergy and community leaders.

The window at the Y refers to the teachings of Judaism, even though it's located in a secular space. Even as a mere footnote within Canadian Jewish history, it represents the values of the Jewish community from a time when that community made few funds available for visual culture. It's only in the 1990s that we begin to see a trend toward investing in the visual arts in synagogues and community centres across the country. In the '90s, most synagogues would have paid off their mortgages, after having put up new buildings in the suburbs in the 1960s, as was the trend in every major Canadian city.

In this regard, the Shalom window was an achievement in Jewish Canadian material culture, because of its historical context and because it was the result of a communal fundraising effort. By comparison, the window at Holy Blossom Temple in Toronto, titled Enlightenment, was completed a little bit later, in 1958, and contains themes related to the period of Emancipation. As well, it was commissioned by the Rohr family of Toronto, who lost two sons in the war.

Canadian Jews do not appear to have a lack of interest in material culture, as evidenced by a burgeoning interest in the esthetics of sanctuaries. Hand-made Torah mantles and parochets (the curtains that cover the Aron Kodesh in a synagogue) are being commissioned, along with stained glass windows, across the spectrum of Jewish congregations.

In light of this interest in esthetic expression, some might wonder why there are so few war memorials of any kind in Jewish public spaces across Canada. The answer seems to lie with the communal interest in settling Holocaust survivors after the war.

Within a short period of time, artistic renderings appeared on Holocaust memorials in cemeteries, and into the 1990s, on the grounds of synagogues. As Frank Bialystock notes in Delayed Impact, the patrons of Holocaust memorials were different from the families that lost loved ones in the war effort, who might have considered the Roll of Names on the national monument in Ottawa to be a suitable and sufficient commemorative marker. Any other national representation – such as a cenotaph or some form of artistic expression – would have involved raising money to fund public statues. This proved to be contentious and required leadership, which was hard to muster, since the families of veterans were dispersed all over Canada.

The groundbreaking ceremony for the Daniel Libeskind-designed memorial to Jewish war veterans, Flames of Memory, to be located in Toronto's Earl Bales Park, took place in 2005, but the national campaign to fund it seems to have sputtered to a halt. More than 60 years after the end of World War II, Canada does not have a national monument to commemorate the service of Jewish war heroes.

During the 1990s, many Canadian congregations installed stained glass windows, suggesting a growing trend in this direction. But for the most part, they are dedicated to family members lost in the Holocaust. Therefore, the Shalom window at the Ben Weider JCC in Montreal should be recognized as an achievement within the context of Canadian Jewish material culture. It represents the sentiments of acculturated Canadian Jews in the 1950s whose Jewish value of zachor was incorporated within what is still a location for memorial services. It evokes the memory of a group of Canadians who gallantly safeguarded our country. The window doesn't represent wealth, but rather the devotion of people who upheld Jewish values within the context of national pride.

Conciliation hasn't worked

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

While participating in a panel discussion on campus anti-Semitism in Toronto recently, it again struck me that Hillel organizers seem still to be clinging uncritically to strategies that may not be working and that have not been seen to protect Jewish students against the abuse and intimidation that all too often comes their way from those who seek to delegitimize Israel and demonize supporters of Jewish statehood.

It is well recognized that there has been an alarming increase in the number and intensity of anti-Zionist activities at universities and colleges around the world over the past few years, and there is little to suggest that we might see this waning in the foreseeable future. And while it is true that Canadian campuses, on the whole, have been relatively less affected than some schools in the United States and England, for example, this is certainly not a reason for complacency. The problems we face are not insignificant, and we can't afford to ignore them.

There are obviously valid differences of opinion on the meaning and process of advocacy – and there are usually very reasonable defences for one or another approach, depending on what the objectives might be at a particular time. But when such approaches, regardless of their perceived robustness, fail to produce their intended outcomes, honest review is needed and more effective models need to be explored.

In its interpretation of advocacy, Hillel appears to rely heavily on the constructs of "shared values," "dialogue" and "outreach." And while each of these in turn – when applied appropriately – likely has some merit in the promotion of Israel and the interests of Jewish students, none of them is especially helpful in countering the highly organized and usually very aggressive anti-Zionist campaigns that continue to pollute our campuses.

So when I sit and listen to a past associate director of Hillel of Greater Toronto admitting that she is hesitant to discuss anti-Semitism on campus because she prefers to "focus on building bridges through dialogue with other members of the campus community," and when I hear her talk, in all seriousness, about a "successful" Hillel program that involved Jewish and Arab students making pudding together, I am, regrettably, left with a better understanding of why so many Jewish students are so poorly equipped to deal with the realities of campus anti-Zionism.

It must surely be apparent that fundamental changes are required in the way that Israel advocacy is conducted on our campuses. What's needed is an entirely different paradigm, one that vigorously promotes responsible activism and empowers our students to more confidently stand up for their rights as Jews.

Conciliation, in whatever form, has run its course, without much success. Something new and proactive now needs to be tried.

Gal Luft gives America the real story on oil

Karin Kloosterman in Jerusalem

Gal Luft advises American senators and presidents on how the United States can end its dangerous dance with foreign oil. Growing up in Haifa, Israel, where he was born, and later in South Africa, Luft became all too aware of how oil is used as a weapon for war.

Newsweek magazine has called Luft a "tireless and independent advocate of energy security," while Esquire magazine called him one of America's Best and Brightest in 2007.

"When 9/11 happened, I immediately realized that this was going to be a long war," says Luft, who was doing a PhD at John Hopkins University when terrorists blew up the World Trade Center towers, and with them America's belief that the country was far from the violence of Middle East fanatics.

"In my childhood in Israel, I saw how oil can be used as a weapon," he says, referring to the 1973 Yom Kippur War and how oil-producing countries banned oil sales to Israel, with most of the free world kowtowing to these demands. "Only Holland and the U.S. stood by Israel."

This experience changed his life and started him thinking about energy vulnerability.

"It's close to me on a personal and intellectual level," he says. "It's clear to me that part of the war on terror should have an economic dimension."

And oil is a major issue, since the entire U.S. economy is built on oil, explains Luft, who is now an American citizen.

After finishing a PhD in strategic studies, he sought out Washington D.C.-based think-tanks that deal with energy security. At the time, not one of them was independently funded or specifically dealing with the issue.

"I realized that people working on energy were being funded either by the Saudis or oil companies," he says.

The obvious conflict of interest struck him. Today, Luft directs the Institute for the Analysis of Global Security, an independent think-tank on energy security that doesn't take a dime from the oil or energy industries. He also co-founded the Set America Free Coalition, an alliance of national security, environmental, labour and religious groups that promotes ways for America to free itself from dependence on foreign oil.

"People believe in the cause and fund it. We give Americans the real story – not moulded by industry and interest groups," Luft says.

While Americans are feeling the pinch of costly oil at the gas pumps, as well as its effects on global warming, Luft has been devising a way out.

Security and energy independence go hand in hand, but it's not easy to suddenly stop using oil, even though the United States no longer uses the fuel in power plants, he says.

"Without petroleum, there is no American way of life. You can't buy a loaf of bread or see your doctor without oil. Countries that have oil will forever be in the driver's seat of the global economy. And these countries will be able to have disproportionate political power," Luft says.

He believes that America must break its dependence on oil – which he says is largely produced by a dangerous cartel of 13 oil-producing governments – and turn it into just another commodity.

The United States' oil reserves are barely a drop in the world bucket, comprising only three per cent of the global supply. Using educational strategies and by lobbying in the U.S. Senate, Luft is promoting a future in which Americans will have a fuel choice.

"That means cars and trucks that can run on petroleum or something else."

He proposes that every car sold in America be a "flex fuel" car that can run on both gasoline and alcohol-derived fuel.

Decision-makers are listening. His organization was the first to highlight the importance of plug-in hybrid cars and brought the idea to Washington in 2006.

Research into new energy sources, he says, is not the burning issue. "What we need to do is focus on deployment. Flex fuel's been around for 100 years. We have to enable these vehicles to compete, to use the forces of the free market to break [oil's] monopoly."

In his efforts to help pass America's energy bill in 2007, Luft and his team created a blueprint for energy security that was instrumental in changing the minds of senators and congressmen, he says.

"We worked with presidential candidates, on Congress briefings on [Capitol] Hill. We also work internationally with a variety of countries to work and educate their political leaders to show them this is an international issue."

It may well take an Israeli who knows the dangers of mixing oil and terror only too well to keep America's economy strong, safe and free from dependence on foreign oil.

Double standards and other 'occupations'

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

In contrast to most of my colleagues, I am one of the pragmatists among Israeli political pundits – neither left nor right on issues of territory and borders.

In my vision of Zionism, the central goal is to maintain and strengthen Jewish democratic sovereignty in the Land of Israel, within the existing international and regional framework. I don't see how borders that reflect biblical Israel, and encompass millions of Palestinians, further this objective, but neither do I find evidence that a return to the armistice lines set after the 1948 Arab invasion, including a divided Jerusalem, will bring us lasting peace based on mutual acceptance.

Which leaves a realistic, as distinct from messianic, middle ground to be defined and carefully nurtured.

Based on this pragmatic and non-ideological perspective, I have lost patience with the torrent of self-righteous and hypocritical condemnations of Israeli "occupation" and false cries of "apartheid."

The scale of Islamic (or Arab) occupation, settlement and racism around the world is far greater than anything that Israel is accused of, but this is never mentioned in polite or diplomatic company. The Arab tribes that followed Muhammad spread their conquest and settlement activities throughout the Middle East, and then kept going to central Asia, western Europe (Spain and Portugal), eastern Europe (to Kosovo and Albania), northern Africa, and east to Asia, including parts of India, (and what is now Pakistan), Malaysia, Indonesia, and southern Thailand.

In these jihads, anyone who didn't accept Islam was simply killed – there was no "resistance," because no one was left to resist. Unlike Israel in 1948 or 1967, these occupiers and settlers did not have the excuse of fighting for their lives against a powerful enemy sworn to "drive them into the sea."

After many centuries (not decades), this Arab and Islamic occupation continues to be characterized by intolerance for different faiths and opinions. The brief period of enlightened Islamic rule, under the Umayyad Caliphate beginning in the 10th century in Spain (Al-Andalus), still left Christians and Jews as second class citizens – dhimmis – who were tolerated, at best, and often persecuted and expelled. But none of this is mentioned by the politically correct defenders of Islam in the United Nations (as it prepares for its Durban Review Conference), nor is it discussed by so-called "human rights" organizations, journalists, and academics and activists on campuses (York University being a case in point).

Some Christian leaders and groups are no better in their obsessive attacks on "Israeli occupation," such as retired South African archbishop Desmond Tutu, as well as the current Archbishop of Canterbury, Lutheran leaders campaigning for divestment, the Mennonite Central Committee, Christian Aid, Caritas and others.

They deign to preach to Israel while ignoring the history of occupation, mass murder of "non-believers" and expulsion in the histories of their own institutions. As the successors to the occupying armies that massacred and brutally persecuted Jews, they are certainly in no position to moralize or preach to Israelis. Europe and its former colonies are largely Christian societies today as a result of this violent and intolerant history – the "occupation" continues.

The claim that Muslim and Christian occupation and intolerance is all ancient history – and, therefore, irrelevant – while Israel's so-called "crimes" are recent is another canard designed to excuse the double standards. If morality (or rather immorality) had a statute of limitations, how many years would it take before these various occupations became legitimate and settlers turned into citizens? Would 20 years be enough? Or 60? Or perhaps 200 years?

The bottom line is that pseudo-moral rhetoric should have no place in political considerations. Stripped of the self-righteous posturing, the emphasis on Israeli "occupation" and "settlement" should be recognized as simply another form of the ongoing racism and anti-Semitism that seeks to prevent the Jewish people from maintaining sovereign equality among the nations of the world.

The Kirshner File

Nazi war criminals present their views in testimonies

Leon Goldensohn, an American physician and psychiatrist, joined the U.S. Army in 1943. When World War II ended, he found himself in Nuremberg, Germany, where the trials of major Nazi war criminals would take place. Six weeks into the proceedings, he was given the responsibility of monitoring the mental health of the accused and defence and prosecution witnesses who had been Nazi officials themselves. For the next seven months, he spoke to them on a regular basis, recording his conversations on a tape recorder.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

These interviews were soon forgotten and, for the next 50 years, gathered dust. When the historian Robert Gellately, a specialist in the Nazi period, discovered the tapes, he was amazed. Goldensohn's interlocutors, ranging from Hermann Goering to Julius Streicher, had apparently been quite frank, and Gellately quickly realized that their testimonies represented an important addition to the Nuremberg war crimes tribunal.

Gellately, a professor of history at Florida State University and the author of Backing Hitler: Consent and Coercion in Nazi Germany, transcribed, edited and annotated the interviews. Now they can be read in Nuremberg Interviews (Alfred A. Knopf), a valuable addition to the historiography of that frightful era.

Hermann Goering, the commander of the Luftwaffe and the president of the Reichstag, was one of Hitler's closest associates. Goering claims that "race politics" in Nazi Germany became important due to the views of officials such as Heinrich Himmler, the SS chieftain, and Joseph Goebbels, the minister of propaganda. Goebbels, he observes, hardened Hitler's anti-Semitism, and used it as a means to achieve power.

Goering reveals himself as a true anti-Semite, despite his assertions that anti-Semitism "played no part in my life" and that it was not the element that persuaded him to join the Nazi party. Goering believed that Jews had too much influence in business and the arts, and that Jews and Germans could not coexist. However, despite his role in the Holocaust, he describes the extermination of Jews as "unjustifiable." He adds, "I would never have made this policy."

Goldensohn assesses Julius Streicher, the founder and editor of the newspaper Der Sturmer, as a paragon of anti-Jewish animus whose favourite topic is anti-Semitism. Describing himself as a student of Jews, Streicher boasts, "I know more about the Jews than the Jews do themselves."

He denies any personal animosity toward Jews, saying that he knew nothing about anti-Jewish riots in Nuremberg – his hometown – in 1938, and claiming that the resettlement of Jews in Madagascar or Palestine would have been preferable to mass murder. "It's perfectly understandable and proper for one to be an anti-Semite," he says, "but to exterminate women and children is so extraordinary… No defendant here wanted that."

Rudolf Hoess, the commandant of Auschwitz from 1940 to 1943, estimates that 2.5 million Jews were murdered there. He says that he was only following Himmler's orders. "Himmler told me that if the Jews were not exterminated… then the German people would be exterminated for all time by the Jews."

When Hoess' wife learned of the murders, she protested. "She was very upset and thought it cruel and terrible. I explained it to her the same way Himmler explained it to me. Because of this explanation, she was satisfied and we didn't talk about it anymore." Nevertheless, she urged Hoess to leave Auschwitz and find another position.

Hans Frank, Hitler's personal lawyer and the governor-general of occupied Poland, admits that his father was strongly opposed to Nazism and had many Jewish friends. He claims that anti-Semitism was not the reason he joined the party and says that "the criminal step of exterminating the Jews physically was taken by Hitler" at the urging of Martin Bormann (his aide), Goebbels and Himmler. Frank says that the party program "merely" called for the removal of Jewish influence in Germany.

Joachim von Ribbentrop, the foreign minister from 1938 to 1945, says that he opposed "the anti-Jewish attitude of the party." As he puts it, "I myself was always of the opinion that the Jewish question was a temporary political one that would find its own solution. I never conceived of the Jew as the great danger, such as Hitler later claimed, and which led to Himmler's atrocities. If I had known about them, even at the end of the war, I would have committed suicide. The first I ever heard of extermination was late in 1944, when the Russians recaptured the region in which Camp Majdanek was installed."

To Von Ribbentrop, the Holocaust would always be a blot on Germany. In his estimation, Hitler initiated a genocidal policy because he had "lost his sense of proportion" and went "wild" on the subject of Jews.

Karl Doenitz, Hitler's designated successor and the admiral of the navy, says he knew nothing about the Holocaust because he was so preoccupied by the war. But he acknowledges that he was aware of Kristallnacht. Goldensohn's verdict is that he deliberately blocked out the crimes perpetrated by the regime. "He rejects the atrocities, the killing of millions of Jews, the barbarism of the SS, the entire criminal modus operandi of the Nazi party. He sees only that he was innocent of any crime, past or present..."

Hermann Goering

Hans Frank

Julius Streicher

Joachim von Ribbentrop

Alfred Rosenberg, the minister of the occupied territories and the editor of the Volkischer Beobachter, effectively blames Jews for their misfortunes. "The Jews are a nation… and should be in their own homeland." He accuses German Jews of having "spat" at German culture by virtue of having "controlled" theatres, publishing companies, stores "and so on."

Walther Funk, the minister of economics from 1937 to 1945, claims that he had many Jewish friends and "never adhered to racial theory." But in the next breath, he argues that "there was too high a percentage of Jews" in Germany's cultural and economic sectors. "But I was not a radical," he notes. "I did not foresee the mass murders or the extermination programs."

Wilhelm Frick, the minister of interior from 1933 to 1943, criticizes Hitler for his "lack of moderation" and faults him for having listened to "criminals of the worst kind" such as Himmler and Bormann.

Hans Fritzche, a senior official in the ministry of propaganda, condemns the "criminal extermination of innocent millions of men, women and children." He distances himself from the crude anti-Semitism of Streicher, but admits he "resisted the Jewish influence in the press and theatre" and says he would have been in favour of "bringing Jewish influence to a percentage… in accord with their relative numbers." Fritz Saukel, the minister of labour, basically concurs with this view.

Otto Ohlendorf, the commander of an Einsatzgruppen killing unit on the eastern front, describes Nazi racial laws as "correct," but excuses himself from guilt by saying that he was under strict orders to carry out his orders. He feels no remorse and claims that since Jews were shot in "true military fashion," no atrocities or brutalities actually occurred.

These testimonies ring true, and what they reveal, in essence, is the ease with which normal, well-adjusted individuals can commit crimes against humanity without even batting an eyelash or recoiling in horror. The depths to which human beings can descend seems bottomless, and this by far is the saddest aspect of Nuremberg Interviews.

Orthodox minyan has Torah honours for women

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

At least 80 people showed up for an inaugural meeting of the Toronto Partnership Minyan last week, reflecting a desire for, or at least an interest in, a halachic prayer service that will offer increased ritual participation for women, including aliyot and Torah reading.

The minyan's mission statement reads, in part, that the community "follows the approach of those Orthodox rabbis who have argued that the dignity of human beings (kavod ha-briyot) is a crucial halachic value that permits us, and in fact obligates us, to expand the roles of women."

Services will be held for the first time on Saturday, Nov. 8, at the Toronto Heschel School, and again on Dec. 6 at Congregation Beth Haminyan, 70 Ridge Hill Drive.

At the meeting, held at the Toronto Heschel School, Rabbi Martin Lockshin discussed a variety of Jewish sources that validate women's participation. An alumnus of Yeshivat Mercaz HaRav Kook with a PhD from Brandeis University, Lockshin is a former director of York University's Centre for Jewish Studies, where he has been on the faculty for the past three decades.

"I'm very excited about the creation of this minyan," said Rabbi Lockshin. The innovations are "not just for the sake of the women, but for the sake of Judaism."

He is among a dozen founding members ranging in age from their mid-20s to their mid-50s, and he was involved in establishing a similar minyan in Jerusalem during a sabbatical last year.

His vision for the minyan – which he said is "remarkably close to being on the same page" as that of the other founders – includes a spirited and spiritual atmosphere, "moving" davening, lots of singing, and a sense of community. It will be based on a partnership between men and women, similar to Kehillat Shira Hadasha in Jerusalem and about 20 other such congregations, mostly in the United States.

Rabbi Martin Lockshin

The minyan, which is expected to be community-led, is not egalitarian and will have a mechitzah, Rabbi Lockshin noted.

"Some duties are done only by men," he said, "but [the minyan] expands the role of women considerably" compared to other Orthodox synagogues and – although he didn't comment on it – to some of Toronto's Conservative congregations.

Halachic values do evolve, Rabbi Lockshin said. As an example, he said that in halachic literature there is no expectation that a parent will support a child beyond the age of eight or 10, but rabbis in Israel agreed unanimously to change the age until which parents must support their children.

Also, he noted, if a parent decides to forego a halachic honour such as having their children stand when they enter a room, the honour is not obligatory.

"Sociologically speaking, we've bought into a different model of honour," he said.

Referring as well to the Babylonian Talmud's prohibition against women reading the Torah "because of the honour of the community," he noted that it's "possible for a community to come together and say our honour consists of something different than what the rabbis thought it was."

He based part of what he said on an article by Rabbi Mendel Shapiro titled Qeri'at ha-Torah by Women: A Halakhic Analysis, which appeared in the Edah Journal, a modern Orthodox publication, in 2001. (Links to Rabbi Shapiro's article and other sources can be found at www.jofa.org/social.php/ritual/synagogue/partnershipm.)

The Edah article "has led to some serious changes in the way people are thinking," Rabbi Lockshin said.

He added that Rabbi Shapiro didn't want revolutions in any existing synagogues. "But if a new community comes together that says, 'We would be honoured if women have aliyot and read from the Torah' then the problem has disappeared," Rabbi Lockshin said.

In his own lifetime, Rabbi Lockshin, who is 57, has seen "tremendous changes" in the area of women and Halachah.

"When I was young in Toronto, [the celebration of] bat mitzvah was basically almost unheard of, even in Conservative circles," he said, citing just one area of change.

In 1975, he said, there was only one place where women could study Gemara intensively. "Things have changed radically since then," he added, noting that one of his three daughters teaches the highest-level Gemara class at New York's Drisha Institute for Jewish Education.

Rabbi Lockshin also cited Rabbi Daniel Sperber, a Talmud professor at Bar-Ilan University, who argues that there was a period in history when women were called up to the Torah.

The hesitancy to innovate sometimes leads to absurd situations, Rabbi Lockshin said, referring to older responsa forbidding heating and electric lights in a synagogue because they had never been used in that context before.

Jay Nathanson, a 37-year-old father of two young daughters who was at the meeting, said it's important for him not to have them excluded. As well, he told The CJN, "it's crucial for me to raise my [six-year-old] son in a community where every possible effort is made to treat women with as much dignity and respect as is feasible within the rigid confines of traditional halachah."

A unique feature of the congregation, according to Barry Gang, one of the founders, is that organizers are not looking to find a permanent home. "We want to travel around the city, without taking anybody out of their existing congregations," he told The CJN.

New women's group holds fundraiser

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Some 400 people were on hand to celebrate two milestones at a film fundraiser recently at the Sheppard Grande Cinema.

Indeed, it was an afternoon of firsts with the opening of the first Toronto Israeli Film Festival and the public debut of Women in Motion (WIM), a new Jewish women's group.

The screening of Noodle on Oct. 26, the opening film of the festival, was a fundraiser held by WIM in support of the One Family Fund, an Israeli-based charity for victims of terror.

Irit Zoran of WIM, the producer of the fundraiser, told The CJN that when she got the green light to hold the event, she had no idea if the fledgling group of about three dozen members would be able to sell the 400 tickets to fill the theatre.

Ahuva Ratner, left, and Irit Zoran [Barbara Silverstein photo]

As it turned out, all the tickets sold so quickly for the first screening of Noodle, that there weren't enough tickets to meet the demand, she recalled. "So many people were interested in attending the event, we directed them to the second screening the next day. That show also sold out."

She said she is grateful to Eran Bester, organizer of the Israeli film festival, for giving WIM the opportunity to hold the fundraiser, even though the group did not have a track record of previous events.

WIM founder Ahuva Ratner thanked Bester for allowing the group "to be part of a new experience of bringing Israel's rich cultural heritage to Toronto."

Ratner, who also serves as co-chair of the Israeli-Canadian division of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's 2009 campaign, established WIM to bring Canadian and Israeli Jewish women together. "One of our goals is to support causes in the Jewish community," she said.

Bringing greetings to the film festival from the State of Israel, Consul General Amir Gissin praised WIM. "Women in Motion is not just another community organization. It's an attempt within the Toronto Jewish community to bring together the established Jewish community and the Israeli community," he said.

These women are showing the rest of the community "the right way," he said. "The work of this wonderful group of devoted women is bearing fruit."

Pam Albert, executive director of the One Family Fund, thanked WIM and Bester for their support. "It means a lot to the Israeli victims of violence to know that people in the Diaspora care," she said.

Financial aid from One Family funds many projects, including sending children to camp in Canada and holding support groups and retreats for bereaved siblings and parents, Albert said.

For Ratner, the event was the culmination of a lot of hard work by WIM members, but she singled out Zoran for her dedication. "This event could not have happened without you," Ratner said. "You were on call 24/7."

She also thanked Ellis Jacob, CEO of Cineplex Entertainment, for providing the venue.

Ratner said she felt a strong affinity to the Israeli victims of terror, noting that the screening marked the 35th anniversary to the day of her brother's death during the Yom Kippur War. "I feel especially connected to those people who have lost their loved ones to acts of terror," she observed.

Joint's doctor provides non-sectarian care in Ethiopia

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Rick Hodes's first contract with the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (the Joint) was to last only six weeks. That was more than 20 years ago but the American-born doctor is still at his post, ministering to the sick and frail in Ethiopia.

For years, Hodes' patient base consisted of Beta Israel and in more recent times, the Falash Mora, descendents of Beta Israel who converted to Christianity generations ago.

The Beta Israel have left Ethiopia, mostly for Israel, and the Jewish state has cut off the Falash Mora immigration.

Nevertheless, the Joint, which closed its clinic in Addis Ababa serving the Falash Mora, will continue to operate in Ethiopia, though it will shift its focus to the wider population, Hodes said.

Dr. Rick Hodes

Hodes was in Toronto last week to meet select groups of UJA supporters and Birthright alumni, update them on the Falash Mora immigration and raise money to support the Joint's works. He also visited Jewish communities in Washington, D.C., Columbus, Ohio, Memphis, Tenn., Houston, Tex. and Cleveland, Ohio.

Hodes said he'll continue to minister to the sick and frail in Ethiopia despite the Joint's shift in emphasis. The Joint still operates a clinic for the Falash Mora in Gondar, in northern Ethiopia, where the Beta Israel lived for centuries. The Joint clinic there is staffed by a local doctor and nurses and provides medical services for a few thousand Falash Mora. "It's not clear whether all will end up in Israel or not," said Hodes, who travels to Gondar every few weeks.

In the meantime, Hodes will focus on providing medical services to Ethiopians of all religions – whether Christian or Muslim. While that has been part of Hodes' mandate for years, with the end of aliyah, it has become the predominant part of his practice.

"The Joint is staying in Ethiopia and working in the non-sectarian development field, as am I," he said.

Among its projects, the Joint sends Israeli doctors to Ethiopia to teach and brings Ethiopian doctors to Israel for training. It builds schools, educates girls and digs wells.

Hodes works part of the week in the Mother Teresa Mission in Addis Ababa, focusing on spinal conditions, cancer and heart disease. He recently arranged for eight Ethiopian youngsters to travel to Ghana for spinal surgery.

Hodes said "I need at least $250,000 per year just to maintain things as they are." The Joint, which is funded by Jewish communities around the world, only supports the office and staff in Ethiopia. Hodes is looking for other sources of funds to operate the medical scholarships, the Ghanian operations and other activities.

"We're funding this from outside the [Jewish] federation system," he said. Federation supporters would have to designate funds specifically for the Joint's Ethiopian projects. North American Jewish federations provide the Joint with its core budget, though federation funds do not go to the agency's non-sectarian programs.

That makes Hodes a part-time fund raiser, applying for grants, soliciting assistance from contacts abroad and by efforts like last week's meet and greet.

"A lot of Jews are interested in helping more than just the Jewish community," he said. "A lot are not interested in helping Jews but would help Africans."

The upside from that approach is that "it can actually bring them into the community and into the Jewish system."

Jennifer Kraft, director of community relations for the Joint, noted that even in its earliest work in Gondar in the early 1980s, the organization provided benefits not just to Jews but to the wider Ethiopian community. That raised the level of trust from the Ethiopian government, allowed the Joint to become entrenched in local society and helped a wide variety of people.

"The Joint builds bridges, performs mitzvot, fosters good will and helps rescue the Jewish community...Rick Hodes is the epitome of mitzvot," she said.

Claims Conference fights for Shoah survivors

By JULIUS BERMAN and BERNIE FARBER

Guest Voice

Since 1951, the Claims Conference has waged a historic and unprecedented campaign for a small measure of justice for Jewish victims of Nazism. For more than 55 years, the Claims Conference has continuously negotiated with the German government and other entities for payments and return of assets to Nazi victims and their heirs.

The organization has the fundamentally impossible task of reconciling the greatest moral challenge in history, the Shoah, with society's basest element, money. No amount of money can compensate Nazi victims, but the Claims Conference has attained recognition for their suffering and losses while also working to ensure that those who perpetrated or assisted in the Holocaust do not continue to profit from it.

The Claims Conference has obtained more than $60 billion (US) for Jewish victims of Nazism and has created numerous programs to pay and assist more than 500,000 Holocaust survivors in 87 countries.

An Israeli film that negatively depicts the Claims Conference was recently reviewed by the CJN. This film is based on mistruths and distortions, using sensationalist tactics and outright lies in order to besmirch the Claims Conference. The CJN reviewer, unfortunately, presented the film as fact and did not attempt to verify the filmmakers' untrue claims. Canadian Jewish Holocaust Survivors and the Canadian Jewish Congress both condemned the movie.

The review also did not mention that the Claims Conference has filed a defamation lawsuit in Israel against the filmmakers. A 28-page rebuttal to the film is on the Claims Conference website, www.claimscon.org.

Also on the Claims Conference website is comprehensive information on programs for Jewish victims of Nazism and detailed information about Claims Conference activities and finances.

For decades, the Claims Conference worked alone on behalf of Nazi victims, when their needs were not a priority for Jewish organizations or for the government of Israel. In recent years, the needs of elderly victims of Nazism have become acute and well known, with the Claims Conference still the primary organization addressing those needs.

In 2007 alone, the Claims Conference distributed or allocated approximately $630 million (US) to and for the benefit of Jewish victims of Nazism and their heirs, the largest amount handled by any Jewish organization worldwide. Total allocations in 2007 for social welfare services for Nazi victims in Canada came to approximately $2.2 million, more than triple the $640,000 allocated in 1995 when the Claims Conference began funding such programs.

The film states, untruthfully, that the Claims Conference has $1 billion (US) in assets at its disposal that it is not using for the benefit of Holocaust survivors. The facts are in the financial statements of the Claims Conference, which are audited by Ernst & Young and available on the Claims Conference website. The movie producers were told that the $1 billion figure was wrong, but they did not allow facts to get in the way of compelling filmmaking.

More importantly, the work of the Claims Conference steadily continues. Recent Claims Conference negotiations in Germany resulted in one-time payments for approximately 6,000 Jewish survivors of the Nazi siege of Leningrad and one-time payments for approximately 6,000 survivors of Nazi-occupied Budapest. Annual negotiations with Germany have increased the number of survivors receiving Claims Conference pensions from 25,000 to more than 100,000, as well as increasing the amount of those payments several times.

In 50 countries, Jewish victims of Nazism have received vital social services with Claims Conference allocations, such as food packages and hot meals, medical care, home care, winter relief, and emergency cash grants to help pay rent and utilities.

Since its establishment, the Claims Conference has been the primary advocate for the rights of Jewish victims of Nazism and their heirs, and it will continue to be so as long as needed. However, Claims Conference resources are finite and will decrease significantly in the coming years. We ask the rest of the Jewish world to join our efforts in assisting survivors, as many of them will be with us for years to come.

Julius Berman is chairman of the Claims Conference. Bernie Farber is chief executive officer of Canadian Jewish Congress.

Getting past baseless hatred

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

The Talmud's statement that "the Second Temple was destroyed because of baseless hatred" is well known. Yet many of us in the Jewish community who purport to mourn the loss of what that Temple represented at the same time embody and repeat the underlying mistake behind its destruction, which is that we lambaste other Jews.

The Jewish world today, as in the past, is ripping itself apart with theological and sociological debates, debates that range from the macro, such as what will Israel look like in five years, to the micro, such as how does one person in Toronto or Montreal view another person's level of religiosity.

What should be an aid in the quest for God – the power of the community to invigorate and renew one's striving for the divine – can often turn into an impasse if a community becomes mired in religious politics, name calling, a lack of communication and cold-hearted judgmentalism.

Rabbi Avraham Yitzchak Kook, the first chief rabbi of Palestine and one of the most creative thinkers in Jewish history, speculates that the essential difference between the First and Second Temple periods was a decline in the life of the collective and the rise of individualism and individual religious consciousness.

He writes that during the Second Temple period, with the "receding of the great universal light, the divine idea began to take on features of individuality." Rabbi Kook believed that the ultimate spiritual power for Jews lies in our collective strength, as opposed to individual fulfilment.

As if anticipating Christopher Hitchens and Richard Dawkins, Rabbi Kook, in his essay The Pangs of Cleansing, had this to say about the search for truth and God: "Atheism has a temporary legitimacy, for it is needed to purge away the aberrations that attached themselves to religious faith… to uproot the dross that separates man from the divine light, and in the ruins wrought by atheism will the higher knowledge of God erect her Temple. Out of the clash of these two opposites will mankind be aided greatly to reach an enlightened knowledge of God, which will bring near its temporal and eternal happiness."

How do we relate to Jews of all kinds? Are we willing to engage others religiously without necessarily trying to convert them to our sense of the truth? Although we may not necessarily share their point of view, they are still part of the Jewish people, and we need each other to be complete.

We can't talk about the destruction of the Temples – and the hatred that precipitated the crisis – and then, in all good equanimity, cut ourselves off from Jews who don't share our views. After all, as Rabbi Eliezer Berkovits has commented, although Orthodoxy believes that Halachah is divine, "it is still after all, a personal belief. No matter how convincing our reasons and our proofs for the faith may be for us, they still will be no more than reasons and proofs for us."

First we cut ourselves off from people in a different denomination, then from people in the same denomination.

Soon there will be no one left to talk to at all.

Jewish Life

Anti-Semitism among Canada's elite

Exiles From Nowhere, The Jews and the Canadian Elite, by Alan Mendelson, Robin Brass Studio.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Political and religious philosopher George Parkin Grant was born into an aristocratic Canadian family. He certainly had yichus. When he attended Upper Canada College, his father was headmaster. When he moved on to Queen's University, he could point to his paternal grandfather who had been principal from 1877 to 1902.

When he was awarded a Rhodes Scholarship and set out for Oxford University, he was aware that his uncle and maternal grandfather had been deeply involved in the history of the scholarship scheme.

Alan Mendelson, the author of Exiles From Nowhere, The Jews and the Canadian Elite, writes, "The more I read about Grant, the more I was struck by stark contrasts between him and his family, on the one hand, and contemporary North American Jewish immigrants and their families, on the other. The Grants and their confrères may have crossed the paths of Jewish immigrants in Toronto or elsewhere, but it was as if they inhabited different worlds."

Mendelson, a professor emeritus of religious studies at McMaster University in Hamilton, points out that Grant's eminent relatives upheld a doctrine of Christian superiority "to support a narrow religious nationalism in which Judaism was relegated to an inferior position." Grant, who became a professor at McMaster University and was well-known for his book Lament for a Nation, couldn't escape the influence and opinions of his relatives, including those of his uncle, Vincent Massey, who was part of Canadian prime minister McKenzie King's inner circle, which conspired to exclude Jewish immigrants from Canada.

The book begins with an account of Goldwin Smith, who in the 19th century, tirelessly churned out anti-Semitic articles for a group of well-regarded journals.

It continues with the anti-Jewish politics of French-Canadian nationalist Henri Bourassa and those of King. The major portion of the book, however, is concerned with Grant, whose intellectual heroes included the historian Arnold Toynbee, who characterized modern Jewry as a parasitic "fossil" race, and the German philosopher Martin Heidegger, who refused to repudiate his Nazi associations.

Another of Grant's heroes was philosopher Simonê Weil, a tragic victim of Nazi brutality who remained ambivalent about her Jewish roots and background.

An engrossing section of the book deals with young Matt Cohen, a well-known Canadian novelist, who became Grant's Jewish protégé. In time, Cohen left McMaster and spoke of Grant as a bundle of contradictions.

As a rabbi in Hamilton, I knew Grant and would second Cohen's appraisal of him. He was drawn to Jews and was often friendly to me, but it was difficult to maintain a close relationship. Once, he told me rather excitedly that McMaster's department of religion had appointed a Jewish scholar – a traditional Jew, he explained, not one of the secular variety.

Grant often remarked that he didn't want to fall into gutter anti-Semitism. Unhappily, his pernicious views veered from the genteel.

Mendelson has done a prodigious amount of research in shaping his continually informative story of some of Ontario's Anglo elite of a previous era.

Milk and honey, falafel and more

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last week, we set out on the quest to find the definitive Israeli cuisine. Many Israeli gourmands feel the country hasn't really developed a unique cuisine yet. Rather, the country has become a melting pot for the styles and tastes brought to it by immigrants. Today, a taste of some of those foods and flavours.

Like most things in Israel, you can look to the Torah to put things into perspective. Food is no exception. While the Land of Israel is blessed with many fruits, seven of them have special status. "God your Lord is bringing you to a good land… of wheat, barley, grapes, figs and pomegranates, a land of oil-olives and honey." (Deut. 8:8-9) [tinyurl.com/torahfoods]

Although there are countless recipes that take advantage of some of those ingredients, I was able to track down a couple that use all of them. There's the Seven Species Salad. But that really doesn't seem like much of achievement, since all you have to do if throw everything into a bowl. [tinyurl.com/speciessalad] On the other hand, somebody had to do some real planning to come up with the Seven Species Pie. [tinyurl.com/speciespie]

Last week, I mentioned Daniel Rogov, one of Israel's foremost food writers, who had difficulty pointing to indigenous Israeli foods. That doesn't mean he thinks the country is bereft of incredible tastes and aromas. His web page is full of fascinating articles, followed by recipes on practically any food or cooking style enjoyed in Israel. Titles include:

- Doing it right with goat's cheese
- Paprika, goulash and the good table
- A mania for meze
- Hyssop – the biblical herb
- Dragons, hot sauce and chicken wings: The foods of Ethiopia [tinyurl.com/rogovrecipe]

The Jewish-food Israeli Archives boasts dozens of recipes, including Sabra Chicken, Falafel Eggplant Parmesan, Meurav Yerushalmi (Mixed Meat, Jerusalem Style) – and two versions of Israeli salad. [tinyurl.com/isrrecipes] A few years ago, the New York Times called Israel "the culinary crossroads of the disparate people who hug the Mediterranean coast." The article concludes with recipes and a glossary of foods that have made their way into the Israeli diet including bagels, chelba, fattoush, harissa, hilbeh, sabras, labaneh, lafah and zaatar. [tinyurl.com/timesfood01]

If you believe that food is a universal language, then you will enjoy some of the eye-popping Israeli food websites – even if you don't speak Hebrew. Giora Shimoni at about.com has done a roundup of the best ones, including Bishulim.co.il ("the comprehensive, dynamic and well-organized Israeli cooking site of the Bishulim magazine"), Hashulchan.co.il ("rich in background content about cooking, and the recipes are primarily professional, gourmet") and Matkon.net ("recipes submitted by enthusiastic cooks in Israel"). You'll find more links at tinyurl.com/isrfoodblogs. And if you prefer to surf in English, check out an Israeli blog called My Mom's Recipes and More. [momsrecipesandmore.blogspot.com]

One unique Israeli food experience really doesn't involve unique food – just plenty of it. Visitors rarely forget their first Israeli hotel breakfast. Although the word "breakfast" is used, this smorgasbord of fresh fruit, green peppers, tomatoes, herrings, eggs, cottage cheese, omelettes, yogurts, potato salad, pastries, etc., really has little in common with the cup of coffee and bowl of cereal North Americans wake up to. You can relive the event vicariously, thanks to one patron who videotaped the offering at a hotel in Eilat. [tinyurl.com/isrbreak]

Not to be outdone, Tel Aviv hotels banded together a while back to host a breakfast buffet on the beach that included 20 tons of assorted cheeses and nine tons of yogurt. The crowd of 70,000 polished it off in an hour. [tinyurl.com/telavivbreak]

I don't know how they felt after their breakfast, but if you're going to indulge in a medley of Israeli foods, you may be asking yourself about the bottom line. That is, what effect will these foods have on your bottom? The Ben-Gurion University's Israeli Food Nutrient Database should answer your questions. [tinyurl.com/bgufood] That site's nutrition information is based on 100-gram portions. If you'd prefer to digest the news according to portion size, try this database. [caloriecount.about.com]

Camp George celebrates 10 years

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Camp George, Reform Judaism's only Canadian overnight camp, recently celebrated its 10th anniversary with a birthday bash at the eZone, an indoor sport and games facility in Etobicoke.

More than 100 alumni, parents and staff members took part in activities ranging from whirly ball to mini golf, ate birthday cake, and sang a new camp song written by children's entertainers Judy and David together with camp staff. The popular singers spent more than a week as part of the camp faculty last summer.

Rabbi Daniel Gottlieb of Thornhill's Temple Kol Ami, founding rabbi of the camp and then-executive director of the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism (CCRJ), also spoke at the birthday event.

Since its inception a decade ago, the camp, which opened in 1999, has grown from 135 to almost 500 campers per summer. Located on 220 acres at the site of the former Northland-B'nai Brith camp on Maple Lake, Ont., just east of Parry Sound, the camp is named in memory of George Reisman, father of Toronto developer Sam Reisman.

Gavin Herman, Camp George's founder and a lay leader in the Reform movement at the time, recalls that he suggested creating the camp after his children returned from a Union for Reform Judaism camp in Okonomowoc, Wisc.

The experience "basically transformed their lives, and gave them a much deeper appreciation for living Judaism," he told The CJN.

Jeff Rose, camp director, said that the camp has completed Phase One of a new fundraising project, which is not a 10th anniversary project per se. So far, $75,000 has been raised, and it is expected to be matched dollar for dollar by the Harold Grinspoon Foundation, based on the amount of money raised in Phase Two. The funds will be used to build a new junior camper "village" for students between grades 2 and 5, probably in 2010, he said.

He estimated that the current buildings are about 30 years old.

Unlike many of its URJ camp counterparts in the United States that have swimming pools because they are not on a waterfront, Camp George is on a lake, offering activities including water-skiing, canoeing, kayaking, sailing and windsurfing. As well, there are daily prayers and experiential educational activities with visiting rabbis and educators, said Rose.

Karen Kollins, left, and Jeff Rose gave away 10 ipod shuffles in a raffle at Camp George's recent birthday bash.

The camp serves children and teens from Michigan, Buffalo, Rochester and Cleveland, as well as Ontario.

"We're continually evaluating our program, making it fun and engaging," said Rose.

Karen Kollins, senior assistant director, has been with the camp since its inception, first as program director and director of education. She met her husband, Daniel Abramson, at the camp in 1999.

Among the changes she's seen are new elements in the camp's ropes course, new cabins, and development of the camp's Jewish education program.

"We worked hard to develop an informal Jewish education program that's integrated through everything we do at camp," she said. Older campers can choose to focus on issues like Israel, social action or a women's track.

"I think we've built an amazing community of campers, staff, alumni and parents."

Hadassah-WIZO bazaar ends 84 year run

The 84th and final Hadassah-WIZO bazaar – known officially as the CHW Toronto Bazaar – was a day of shopping and nostalgia as about 9,500 visitors searched for bargains in everything from wedding gowns to kitchen gadgets to cleaning supplies, and reminisced about past bazaars. Organizers hope to raise about $300,000 for Hadassah-WIZO projects. [Carolyn Blackman photos]

Holocaust Education Week explores the Art of Dissent

By Daniel Horowitz

During the rise of Nazism, a Cologne artist named Willy Fick decided to capture the dark images of the time by creating symbolic paintings that – through the use of metaphors – explored suppression, dehumanization, victimization, randomness and isolation.

Today, in spite of the Nazis, fire and bombing, the works remain as photographic witness, opening a dialogue about the role the arts play in society.

The archival photographs and a number of original works were discovered in an old shed in Fick's backyard by his grandniece in 1967, the year of the artist's death. Some of these works are now permanently housed in the Fick-Eggert Collection of the Art Gallery of Ontario, a donation from the family.

As part of UJA Federation's 28th annual Holocaust Education Week which ends November 9, exhibition curator and Fick's grandniece, Angelika Littlefield, worked with nine Toronto Holocaust survivors and nine young people, diverse in age and culture, to create contemporary responses to feature in The Art of Dissent as signage and original art.

The Art of Dissent, which runs from November 2 to 16, is housed at Toronto's Lonsdale Gallery, located at 410 Spadina Road.

"We have Jennifer Ritter, the director of the Holocaust Centre, to thank for this groundbreaking exhibit. She enabled me to renew my Uncle Willy's important message about protecting democracy," said Ms. Littlefield.

The Art of Dissent runs from November 2-16 at Toronto's Lonsdale Gallery.

"The contemporary responses of these young artists and the Holocaust survivors, model the vital interface between learning the lessons of the past and thinking about their implications for the present," explained Ritter.

"Toronto's Holocaust Education Week has a proud history," said Chad Wolfond, principal of the Lonsdale Gallery. "We are pleased to be a part of something new, in supporting the Holocaust Centre's endeavour to create an exhibition that explores the meaning of Fick's dissenting art for today's society. The exhibition showcases the talent and depth of our community's young artists."

One of the world's most comprehensive Holocaust education events – Holocaust Education Week, coordinated by the Holocaust Centre of Toronto, UJA Federation, offers more than 160 timely and thought-provoking educational and cultural programs, including a series of compelling, first-hand testimonies from survivors.

"We trust that this year's Holocaust Education Week program inspires our community to continue to support our work and stand up for the humane values of tolerance, understanding and respect for the inherent dignity of all," said Lorraine Sandler, Chair, Holocaust Centre of Toronto.

The chairs of the 2008 Holocaust Education Week Committee are Robert Buckler, Rachel Iskov, and Lesley Schwartz.

IN GOOD TIMES
OUR COMMUNITY CARES

IN TOUGH TIMES
OUR COMMUNITY SHINES

These are extraordinary days. Days of economic uncertainty. Days of challenge and anxiety. But these are also days of extraordinary community unity and care for one another. As our United Jewish Appeal campaign continues to grow, it's clear that our community will not neglect the vulnerable who depend on our support whatever the economic climate.

Our history teaches us no less. We are responsible for each other. We are committed to repairing the world.

It's also the spirit of Toronto where commitment conquers adversity and generosity generates hope for the future whatever challenges may come our way.

What an incredible community. What an amazing city!

UNITED JEWISH APPEAL

Campaign 2009 surpasses the $43 million mark

Donors stepping up in spite of current economy

By Daniel Horowitz

Just past the midway point, United Jewish Appeal Campaign 2009 has reached an impressive milestone in spite of today's economic climate, having recently surpassed the $43 million mark.

"Many donors have stepped up beyond levels they have committed to in the past, in light of the inevitably greater needs," says Bruce Leboff, chair, along with Ken Tanenbaum, of UJA's Bay Street Division. "UJA agency partners ranging from Jewish Family & Child, Meals on Wheels, JVS, and others are preparing for tremendous potential increases in demand for help by members of our community. It falls to the rest of us that as a community, we ensure that we have the capacity to respond. United Jewish Appeal donors have responded meaningfully to this ideal. It is a privilege to be a part of this strong, responsible community."

"It is clear that we cannot take the approach to wait out this storm – because that storm isn't passing anytime too soon," explains Lisa Draper, chair of UJA's Women's Campaign & Advocacy. "So, the calls continue and it has been my experience that our incredible donors are still digging deep and giving to the campaign – almost without exception. This really does set our community apart from others.

Campaign 2009 – chaired by Fran Sonshine and Henry Wolfond – is comprised of four strategic initiatives:

Inspiring Jewish Identity in the Next Generation
Standing with the People of Israel
Transforming Lives
Engaging a Growing and Dynamic Community

"While each donor must consider their own situation, the needs of the community grow and the most vulnerable members of our community are impacted the worst, whether it be from the higher cost of basics like food and clothing, or in some cases, the financial security of our seniors," says Leboff. "That is why those who are able must step forward and do all they can. A strong commitment at a time of economic uncertainty is a tremendous statement of commitment to the principles of tzedakah."

"It is times like these when our support is even more important," says Draper. "United Jewish Appeal is anticipating this increased need and is relying on our donors to shine in these difficult times. As donors, we can be assured that UJA will continue to invest our dollars very carefully and strategically. It is a matter of trust. I trust that the dollars my family donates will be well spent."

Donors to United Jewish Appeal continue to support Campaign 2009 in spite of the current economic climate.

Reaching out to Toronto's Russian community through the arts

By Daniel Horowitz

There are approximately 40,000 Russian-speaking Jews living across the Greater Toronto Area and one young woman is about to find out if the arts truly represent a universal language that will connect them to Jewish life in the city.

Neta Golshtein, 27, a resident of Tel Aviv, recently joined the staff of the Koffler Centre of the Arts to begin her two-year appointment as its Israel Emissary through the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI).

Her task, made possible thanks to funding provided by UJA Federation, is to reach out to Jewish émigrés from the former Soviet Union and Eastern Europe, who now call Toronto home, and get them involved in the city's flourishing Jewish community through the Koffler, creating programs that specifically appeal to these citizens.

Golshtein, whose parents made aliyah from their native Kishinev when their daughter was ten years old, has an impressive resume for the job, but an even more impressive outlook.

"I want to engage in a real dialogue with the many Russian communities in the city, and work with them to establish and develop cultural and educational opportunities tailor made to this population's needs," enthuses Golshtein.

It was during her tenure last year with JAFI in New York where was involved in seminars, camps and leadership retreats for new Russian immigrants, that she received an interesting and unique perspective on the immigration process.

"I was exposed to the tremendous challenges regarding identity facing the growing Russian community in North America," she explains. "Because of this population's many varying and often conflicting identities, it has become clear to me that they demand a more nuanced perspective when it comes to culture and education."

"We are delighted to have Neta's expertise in reaching out and creating arts programs that will especially appeal to our Russian Jewish community," says Lori Starr, executive director, Koffler Centre of the Arts. "She brings excellent training and expertise as an artist and arts programmer, and an unbridled enthusiasm for her assignment."

This spring, a kick-off festival developed with Neta's expertise will help launch a new Koffler series of programming that will explore Russian Jewish culture through music, literature, food, film, art and more.

"As someone with a similar background to most new immigrants, knowing the experiences of immigration, I am going to have to approach the Russian community on their terms, with plenty of empathy, to help us create the right programs which will engage them. My vision is that in the long run this will lead to mutual enrichment between the established Jewish community of Toronto and the newcomers. Amongst other things, this is also central to helping them achieve a sense of belonging and acceptance, something all of us seek at one time or another in our lives."

Israeli elections won't make or break peace hopes

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The Canadian media responded quickly to Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni's decision to call for elections after her efforts to form a coalition government proved unproductive.

Overwhelmingly, news reports depicted the election as a stark choice between the "moderate" Livni and the "hawkish" Likud party leader Benjamin Netanyahu. The peace process was seen as the dominant issue – with positive implications stemming from a Livni premiership, and negative ones arising from a Netanyahu victory.

On CBC Radio on Oct. 27, Peter Armstrong explained: "Livni trails in almost every poll here to right-wing Likud Party leader Benjamin Netanyahu. Netanyahu opposes making territorial concessions to the Palestinians and says he'll pull out of peace talks altogether."

In "Livni sets stage for new elections" (Globe and Mail, Oct. 27), Carolynne Wheeler wrote that a Netanyahu government "would radically change Israel's policies on talks with the Palestinians and with the wider Arab world. Mr. Netanyahu has pledged to abandon the Annapolis process in favour of a program of joint economic development in 'seam' areas where Israel meets the West Bank. He has also promised never to divide Jerusalem... and to keep the Golan Heights, the single biggest issue in peace talks with Syria."

Similarly, the Toronto Star's Oakland Ross ("Peace bid in peril as Israeli talks fail," Oct. 27) noted that "Netanyahu has ruled out any compromise on [Jerusalem] and also opposes making major territorial concessions in the quest for peace – positions that set him well apart from the more accommodating stances favoured by both [outgoing Israeli Prime Minister Ehud] Olmert and Livni."

While it's true that Livni has espoused greater willingness to make territorial concessions with the Palestinians than Netanyahu, certain facts should not be forgotten.

First, when Netanyahu was prime minister (1996-1999), he spoke against making concessions, but he accepted the Wye accords and gave up much of Hebron to Palestinian control. Netanyahu also held indirect talks with then-Syrian president Hafez Assad, including, it was reported, over the fate of the Golan Heights. So being in the opposition and making "hawkish" statements might not be the best indication of how Netanyahu may actually govern if he wins.

The reality is that no government can last for long if it doesn't represent the centre. The perennially vexing issue is how to cobble together a coalition that achieves this. Livni's refusal to yield to what she determined to be the excessive demands of the Shas party has increased her own standing with the electorate and may point the way.

Second, polls show that a majority of Israelis accept a two-state solution and are prepared for major territorial concessions. However, this same majority will not make concessions at any price, especially after enduring a continuing rain of rockets following Israel's unilateral withdrawal from Gaza in 2005.

What Israelis need to see is a unified Palestinian leadership that is not only prepared to make peace with Israel as a Jewish state, but also capable of providing essential security.

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas remains too weak to ensure such security. Moreover, his term is scheduled to expire in January, although he is attempting, against considerable opposition, to extend it for a year. Meanwhile, the Palestinians are still divided between the rejectionist Hamas faction in Gaza, and a fractured Fatah in the West Bank. Thus, it's premature to talk about how the prospects for peace are being lost due to the upcoming Israeli elections.

Tzipi Livni with U.S. Senator Barack Obama

In a telephone interview, Jim Lederman, Israel correspondent for Oxford Analytica, reflected on how the western media are reporting on the Israeli election: "Most of the coverage is too narrowly focused on one storyline about the occupied territories. Israelis have every reason to be concerned about other issues, because they don't see Abbas being able to deliver on the peace process.

"Missing in the coverage so far is any mention of the existential issues Israelis are facing, including, foremost, the Iranian nuclear threat, terrorism, the world economic crisis and even corruption. These are the issues that concern Israelis themselves and over which the elections will be fought."

Paul Michaels is communication director for the Canada-Israel Committee.

Rwandan survivor brings message of peace

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

"We somehow have to come up with a culture of peace, which we all participate in establishing," a Rwandan genocide survivor told a group of Grade 9 students at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Vaughan campus last week.

Patrick Sharangabo spoke to the students at the invitation of Jamie Cohen, an English teacher and filmmaker who has made a short film inspired by his life.

Cohen told The CJN that he recently finished teaching a unit on mythology that included study on what a hero is. Sharangabo – who, in 2006, received a New Pioneers award for community activism – is Cohen's "real-life hero," Cohen said.

Sharangabo completed a BA in political science, African studies and aboriginal studies at the University of Toronto while working full time, after immigrating here alone as a 16-year-old. Currently, he works full time and volunteers with young Rwandans including genocide survivors.

But between April and July 1994, the year the Grade 9 TanenbaumCHAT students were born, Sharangabo was a 12-year-old boy whose father and uncle were among the 800,000 Rwandans killed.

Cohen asked his students to think about what real-life lessons they could take from Sharangabo's life, and what they could change in themselves to become role models for those who know them.

Sharangabo told the students he is not a hero, just a human being. He hoped the students could relate to his story because he was close to their age at the time.

"When a society turns against you, you can't go and see your principal and tell him what's wrong," he told them. "It's a systemic thing," he said, noting the similarities between the Rwandan genocide and the Holocaust.

"Anyone had the right to abuse you, even to abuse your father or mother," he said.

Knowing that a genocide was imminent, Sharangabo's parents sent his siblings to stay with relatives, and the rest of the family went into hiding. Once they were discovered, his father was killed "instantly."

Grade 9 student Alex Magod presents Rwandan genocide survivor Patrick Sharangabo with a quote from Rabbi Shimon ben Gamliel: "On three things the world is sustained: on truth, on judgment, and on peace."

Sharangabo was taken outside by a former classmate to the street, where others were being killed. He was struck with a machete in the head, arm and leg and thrown into a mass grave, drifting in and out of consciousness from blood loss until he woke up, saw the moon, and realized he was still alive. He managed to make his way out of the grave and eventually reconnected with his mother.

The time immediately following the genocide was the most difficult he had ever faced, he said, walking past skeletons on the same streets where the atrocities had occurred. His mother decided it would be good for him to leave the country.

When Sharangabo left for North America, he realized he was going to live in "another world, with happy people and ignorant people – the regular type of world, but they didn't share where I was coming from."

In a way, he had to "construct a new human being," he said. Educationally, he was motivated by the thought of his peers who died without having the opportunity to pursue their goals. "That was my war, to stay in school and become that which the others could have become."

He described himself now as "happy, for sure," his words backed up by his smile and the rapport he seemed to create easily with the students. Survivors need to have hope in order to move on, he said. "As things get worse, you'll always notice a sign of hope, and that's what guides you all the way there."

The knowledge that "there is no worse place" than where he had been also helped him face challenges as a teenage immigrant on his own, he said.

Genocide is a global issue, said Sharangabo. It is "like a hurricane that moves from one site to another.

"It's up to me and you, and all of us, to establish 'Never Again' that has a real meaning," he said. "What can we do to make sure genocide doesn't continue?"

Jewish professionals matched with young Somalis becomes political, which only leads to strife. But today, with the CSC and the CJC, the stress is on the 'Canadian' part of our names... Together, we are trying to forge a path and make a statement we haven't been able to make before. This is more than just a dialogue."

The Jewish-Somali Project will match Jewish professionals with young Somalis who are new to the workforce. The federation will use its contacts to recruit volunteer mentors and develop the organizational infrastructure to make the project work, English said. There will be no financial allocation by the federation, he added.

While no timeline for the mentoring program was announced, English suggested it could begin by the end of the year.

In an interview with The CJN, CSC director Digal Haio said there are more than 150,000 Somalis in Toronto, who mostly arrived between 1991 and 1996. Young Somalis are struggling to enter a number of professions and suffer from a lack of support by experienced professionals. The CSC "reached out and expressed the desire to meet other communities in Canada that faced similar challenges. The CIPP facilitated the contact with the Jewish community," which was the only one to respond, Haio said.

Asked whether a partnership with Jewish organizations was problematic for a Somali organization, Haio said there was "no hesitation," in forging the alliance. CSC's goal is to build a strong leadership cadre for the community and "the Canadian Jewish community was kind and generous enough to help us." Politics, she added, "were left aside."

Haio said the CSC was created as an alternative to the "mainstream" Somali community organizations that are male-dominated and limited "to a certain age group."

CSC's board consists of five students, including three women. It considers itself an advocacy organization while the other Somali groups are focused on "settlement," she said.

The first mentorship program announced last week will pair James Morton, past president of the Ontario Bar Association, with law student Ayan Hersi. Morton is also CSC legal counsel.

Persaud also announced creation of the Somali-Jewish Friendship Scholarship Fund for post-secondary students of Somali background. The scholarship is designed to assist the development of Somali community leaders. Businessman and philanthropist Nathan Jacobson has agreed to support the first scholarship, which includes one year of university studies, all expenses paid.

Ner Israel Yeshiva marks 50th anniversary

Ner Israel Joseph Tanenbaum Yeshiva of Toronto, the first full-time yeshiva in greater Toronto that provides room and board, celebrates its 50th anniversary at a dinner on Nov. 23.

Ner Israel was located on Finch Avenue West for its first 27 years. In 1986, it moved to its present campus in Thornhill.

A large number of rabbis, teachers and lay leaders who have gone through the portals of the yeshiva have contributed to the spiritual growth of the Toronto community.

The yeshiva's primary goal is to produce well-informed b'nai Torah, imbued with devotion and scholarship. Although the majority of the students at Ner Israel are from Toronto, they also come from other cities in Canada, the United States and abroad.

In addition to its focus on Torah, Ner Israel is also a multi-faceted educational centre. Its secondary school pursues the highest standards of secular training, and all courses are fully accredited to meet the requirements of the Ontario Ministry of Education. All members of the teaching faculty are certified, many with advanced standing in their discipline. Some are department heads in the local secondary public school system.

The school's Bais Medrash Graduate Program is recognized as a degree-granting institution, and the yeshiva's Hershel Rubenstein post-graduate school offers an outstanding kollel program.

Ner Israel is supported by the community, which enables it to offer the highest standards in Jewish education. Acceptance at the yeshiva is based solely on the students' capabilities, regardless of financial consideration.

On this occasion, the officers and faculty have chosen to pay tribute to six prominent founders who were instrumental in establishing and maintaining the yeshiva. Those who will be remembered for their work on behalf of the school are Meyer Lebovic, Herschel Rubenstein, Saul Sigler and Joseph Tanenbaum; while Abraham Bleeman and Sandy Hofstedter will be honoured for their leadership and effort. All of the honorees have sons and/or grandsons who continue to serve as officers and board members.

The guest speaker of the anniversary dinner, at the Terrace Banquet Centre in Vaughan, Ont., will be the orator and author Rabbi Yosef Viener, the spiritual leader of Shaar Hashomayim in Monsey, N.Y, and an alumnus who studied in the yeshiva's kollel for several years.

York U ends Jewish holiday closing policy

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

A York University professor's four-year effort to have the school end its practice of cancelling classes on Jewish High Holidays is over, but the school is denying that he had anything to do with the decision to change its policy.

Late last month, York's senate passed a resolution to end the 34-year practice of cancelling classes on Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, and of not scheduling exams on the first two and last two days of Passover.

History professor David Noble, who is Jewish, has been battling with York since 2004 to end the practice, which he said was discriminatory, because students of other faiths don't get the same consideration.

In 2006, Noble filed a complaint with the Ontario Human Rights Commission (OHRC), which, after an investigation, said that the "practice of not scheduling classes on Jewish High Holy Days clearly results in differential treatment on the basis of creed." Last June, the commission decided to put the case before a human rights tribunal.

York spokesperson Alex Bylik confirmed that the university's senate, governing body for academic policy at York, passed a resolution on Oct. 23 to end the practice, beginning in 2009, but he said the decision "had nothing to do with Noble's complaint."

The resolution states that the senate's change to the policy on sessional dates and the scheduling of examinations was made because the "practice of not scheduling classes on Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur in the fall term regularly creates an imbalance in the progression of different sections of the same course and necessitates the addition of make-up days at the end of the term."

It went on to say that students and faculty who are affected by the decision will be covered by the school's religious observance policy, which allows for missed classes, examinations and assignments and is enough to accommodate "the needs of our markedly diverse and very large community."

The policy "will provide equitable and adequate accommodation of the needs of all students and faculty, no matter their religious beliefs," the resolution states.

But Noble, who held a three-hour seminar on Rosh Hashanah in defiance of the old policy, said that York is just trying to "save face."

"It was only since the spring when the human rights commission decided to send it to the tribunal that this happened. There is absolutely no ambiguity… They were forced to do it," Noble said.

"The sad thing is that York University did not act because of a concern about discrimination, a concern about fairness, or a concern about a human rights code. They acted because there was a gun to their head, and that is a shame."

Noble is no stranger to controversy at York and has been a thorn in the side of the school's administration for years.

In 2004, he distributed a flyer called The Tail that Wags the Dog, which suggested that some members of the York University Foundation, York's fundraising arm, were staunch pro-Israel supporters and were the reason why a Jewish pro-Palestinian activist was expelled for his role in a noisy campus protest.

Noble had sought $10 million and a formal apology from the university after it released a statement that said that the flyer was "targeting Jewish members of the York community."

Last fall, the university was ordered to pay him $2,500 for "failing to respect Prof. Noble's rights as an academic," and it was also ordered to withdraw the statement from its website.

Although Noble is pleased that York has amended the High Holiday closing policy, he said he hasn't dropped the human rights complaint because it also deals with a reprisal claim that he wants York to be accountable for.

"In the four years since I began this, I have suffered a lot of abuse from York University, so that will continue to go forward to the tribunal," Noble said.

He said the three parties – York, the human rights commission, and himself – will meet Dec. 2 with the chair of the tribunal.

"It is really important that people understand that York's behaviour in this regard… It's pretty ugly stuff, and it's important to take it to the tribunal so that it never happens again."

In addition to ending the Jewish holiday policy, York's senate also approved a fall reading week, starting next year, so that students will have a break in both semesters. The fall break will take place the week of Thanksgiving Monday.

UJA Federation announces nominees

David Engel, nominating committee chair for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, has announced the nominees for the board of directors and individual representatives council members.

Elections will be held during UJA Federation's annual meeting on Thursday, Dec. 11, 2008, at 7:30 p.m., at Beth Tzedec Congregation.

In accordance with the bylaws, the governance consists of a council, a board of directors and an executive committee. The board of directors, the chair and the senior vice-chair will be elected by the council members; the executive committee will be ratified by the board of directors from among the directors. No nominations can be made from the floor during the annual meeting. However, any member of the Jewish community may be placed in nomination by complying with the following bylaws:

"In order to be elected or appointed and to continue as a council member, each individual must (a) be an individual general member; (b) have made a financial commitment to the United Jewish Appeal of Greater Toronto in respect of the most recent annual campaign and be in good standing with the United Jewish Appeal in respect of such commitment; and (c) shall not have refused to remove any barrier that is within his or her control that would prevent his or her spouse's religious re-marriage."

"Each individual representative council member shall be elected at an annual general meeting by the individual general members from among the qualified candidates duly nominated therefor by the nominating committee or nominated by any seven individual general members; provided that in respect of nominations made by individual general members: (a) no individual general members may nominate more than three nominees for election as individual representative council member at any annual general meeting; (b) such nominations shall be in writing and accompanied by the written consent of the nominee; and (c) such nominations shall be delivered to the secretary at least 21 days before the annual general meeting at which the election is to occur."

Nominated for chair of the board is David Koschitzky and senior vice-chair of the board is Alan Winer.

Nominees for the board of directors include: Elena Aleinikov, Natan Aronshtam, Barbara Bank, Austin Beutel, Andrea Cohen, Stephen Cole, Richard Diamond, Sheldon Disenhouse, David Engel, Steven Farber, Sherry Firestone, Jill Goldberg-Reitman, Sheldon Goodman, Shawna Granovsky, Louis Greenbaum, Alison Himel, Debbie Kimel, David Koschitzky, Elyse Lackie, Joseph Lebovic, Glennie Lindenberg, David Mansell, Ran Mesterman, Steve Mayer, Melissa Muskat, Gilbert Palter, David Peltz, Elan Pratzer, Ariella Rohringer, Honey Sherman, Randy Shiff, Eileen Silver, Fran Sonshine, David Spiro, Arthur Stern, Kenneth Tanenbaum, Richard Venn, Mark Waldman, Alan Winer, Elizabeth Wolfe, Cecile Zaifman.

The following are to be elected for a two-year term 2008-2010 as individual representative council members: Cheryl Appleby Jackson, Sandra Atlin, Marlene Axmith, Arna Banack, Tobie Bekhor, Marc Benjamin, Donald Bennett, David Wm. Brown, Sandra Brown, Vicki Campbell, Robert Cherniak, Jack Chisvin, Karen Chisvin, Andrea Cohen, Jeffrey Cohen, Roz Davidson, Yale Drazin, Anita Ekstein, Susan Fenwick, Bernard Fishbein, Abe Glowinsky, Brian Goldberg, Jill Goldberg-Reitman, Jeffrey Goldfarb, Stephen Goldhar, Harry Gorman, Shawna Granovsky, Abraham Green, Louis Greenbaum, Judy Gwartz, Michael Halbert, Susan Harris, Debbie Kimel, Lynn Kirshin, Leslie Klein, Henry Koschitzky, Stanley Kugelmass, Ruth Ladovsky, Judy Libman, Howard Lichtman, Glennie Lindenberg, Agi Mandel, Ran Mesterman, Pamela Medjuck, Howard Meyer, Paul Morton, Gilbert Palter, Elliott Peranson, Gerald Richler, Rammy Rochman, Gerald Ross, Sheila Rother, Alan Sandler, Laurie Sheff, Marlene Sklar, Arthur Stern, Raymond Stone, Kenneth Tanenbaum, Cyrel Troster, George Wasserstein.

In addition to the individual representatives listed, each group general member of the federation shall be entitled to two representatives on the council (group representative council members). Any group general member which has membership in good standing in excess of 100 persons residing in the Greater Toronto Area shall be entitled to one additional group representative on the council. According to the bylaws of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, organizations and associations may apply to become group general members by submitting an application that confirms that it subscribes to the objects of the UJA Federation, and promotes the United Jewish Appeal annual campaign. Applications for group general membership were solicited via mail in October 2008. All group general members must be registered with UJA Federation by Oct. 28, 2008.

This notice was published on UJA Federation's website (jewishtoronto.com) on Friday, Oct. 31, 2008.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

George Brown dean aims to improve health care system

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Lorie Shekter-Wolfson, George Brown College's dean of community services and health sciences, is leading the charge to improve the Canadian health- care system with the help of $61.5 million in government funding.

As of September 2011, Toronto's Waterfront will be home to George Brown's new Centre for Health Sciences building, which will include a community centre and a residence.

The centre, which Shekter-Wolfson calls a "beacon of health care education," will house the four schools comprising about 3,000 full-time students from the nursing, health services management, health and wellness and dental health schools.

She said that the new building will help them increase their intake of students by a third. About 600 new spots will be open for nursing students.

"The biggest increase is in nursing because although the government announced that it's going to slow down their commitment to funding full-time nursing jobs… research is showing that nursing is entering a huge crisis within the next five years because the average age of working nurses are in their late 40s and nursing is such a physically demanding profession that you won't find a lot of people working until 65."

She said that there is going to be a significant exodus of nurses and "if we don't start increasing our intake, I'm worried about this."

Shekter-Wolfson said that in addition to creating more spaces for students, the centre is going to be a "purpose-built environment" that will facilitate an interprofessional education framework.

She said the concept of interprofessional education, which is when two or more professions learn with, from and about each other to improve the quality of care, originated in England but Canada is now considered one of the leading countries in the field.

She credits the 2002 Romanow Report, which outlined suggestions to improve the health-care system, with setting the stage for the interprofessional education movement in Canada.

"One of the findings was that if we're going to want changes in the system, we have to ensure that we educate students differently, otherwise, we'll end up with the same problems."

Since then, Shekter-Wolfson, who started her career as a social worker and was on the board of directors for Jewish Family and Child in Toronto, has been working to garner support for changing the face of health-care education in Canada.

She said she wanted "to change the curriculum… shifting it so students are aware of more professions and they have exposure to other professions… We're trying to create opportunities for other students to be exposed in our own controlled applied learning environment to the elements of inter-professional care."

Shekter-Wolfson, who sits on Health Force Ontario's Interprofessional Care Strategy Implementation Committee to determine how this framework is to be implemented in the education and health-care sectors, said she has been collaborating with other institutions including the University of Toronto, Michener Institute for Applied Health Sciences and Ryerson University.

She has also worked closely with the Ministry of Training, Colleges and Universities, Ministry of Health and the Ministry of Infrastructure to get their political advisers to push for George Brown to get the funding to build the centre.

When Waterfront Toronto was approaching institutions about expanding their campuses on the waterfront, George Brown's leaders presented Shekter-Wolfson's concept that was based on her years of experience working in the health-care system and outlined the reality that health-care professionals don't work as well together as they could.

Lorie Shekter-Wolfson

"There isn't one person out there that will tell you that they didn't have a story where the left hand and the right hand weren't aware of each other," said Shekter-Wolfson, who is the president of the Canadian Association of Allied Health Programs.

She said that this can sometimes lead to mistakes that can negatively interfere with a patient's health. She added that while health-care students are being educated well, they aren't being taught to work in teams and learn about each others' profession.

"If we can teach them to ask the right questions then we've done our job."

She said she met with some internal reluctance to the project because it involves changing the curriculum and practice, but whenever she led with the heart, sharing stories that everyone could relate to, no one could disagree.

"There were barriers that had to do with physical location, and there were barriers that had to do with things such as scheduling. The other key barrier… was that people don't know how to teach this because it's an evolving issue."

But she added that organizations such as Health Force Ontario have been very committed to making her vision a reality.

"They're not just talking about education but what the system has to do. They're talking about what the professions have to do differently, what legislation has to be changed to support it – it's not just one element."

She said that about a third of the goals are already in works.

"We've created courses, we've developed projects, we've already got a mapping of what we've done and what we still need to do," she said.

"If ever the stars were aligned or there was a perfect storm in a positive sense, it's now. Because you've got the sector, you've got government and you've got the educators working together like they've never worked together before."

FAMILY SING-ALONG: Families at Bialik Hebrew Day School enjoyed a recent sing-along with senior kindergartners, featuring Shabbat and holiday songs in Hebrew and Yiddish. A highlight was dancing together to Israeli children's folk dances.

בחירות באופק

אבל אולי לא יכול מנהיג ישראלי להיות הגון וישר. מאוד יתכן שעצם קבלת התפקיד פירושה לעשות פשרות שתוך מספר שנים יביאו אותך לחקירה משטרתית. וזה מאוד מאוד עצוב, אבל שישאר בינינו.

חינוך מיני

תודה לרותי זומר על הקטע הבא:

שיר הקטנה שואלת את אביה המופתע "אבא, מה זה מין?"

ואז הוא מספר לה על אברי מין, אונות, מין קבוצתי ואראלי, זנות ומה לא... פתאום הוא תופס שאולי הגזים ושואל את בתו:

"רגע, שיר, למה בעצם את שואלת על מין?"

עונה לו הילדה: "כי המורה אמרה שמחר נלמד על ארבעת המינים".

"אם זר קוצים"-אירוע חד פעמי לישראלים

Chabad opens new learning institute in Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — For the past 10 years, the Chabad Movement in Winnipeg has offered an annual summer yeshiva program in August, staffed by yeshiva students from out of town, that's open to the entire community.

Now, for the first time, Chabad will be offering formalized Jewish study all year round through its newly established Jewish Learning Institute (JLI).

Rabbi Shmuly Altein, Chabad's director of adult education programs in Winnipeg, and his wife, Adina.

"We have put together three six-week courses to be offered in the fall, winter and spring, respectively," said Rabbi Shmuly Altein, Chabad Lubavitch of Winnipeg's new 25-year-old director of adult education. "Each course will focus on different topics. The idea is to make Torah learning accessible to contemporary Jews."

The first course – which begins Nov. 11, is titled Soul Maps and will explore Kabbalah and how it can be used to foster psychological well-being.

The winter session will concentrate on Talmud and Halachah, while in spring, students will study stories from the Torah and see what lessons can be applied to contemporary society, Rabbi Altein said.

The Altein name is well known in Winnipeg's Jewish community. Rabbi Avrohom Altein, Shmuly Altein's father, has been this city's Lubavitch Rabbi for close to 40 years. Shmuly left here at 13 to attend an Orthodox high school in Detroit. After high school, he went on to attend Chabad's Rabbinical Educational Institute in New York.

Upon graduation, he was dispatched to Australia for further education and training. In Australia, he taught at a rabbinical college as well as in the community, organizing children's programs and retreats and travelling to distant outposts of that island continent in search of Jewish residents.

In 2006, he returned to New York, where he received his smichah from Rabbi Shnear Zalmon Labkovsky, the dean of the Central Yeshiva. In the summer of 2006 and 2007, he served as a Chabad camp director in the Catskills.

Altein and his equally accomplished wife, Adina, returned to Winnipeg with their baby daughter on Sept. 1 to take up his new posting. (The couple welcomed a son to the family in mid-October.)

They spent part of the summer at a worldwide conference of Jewish Learning Institute teachers, held in the Catskills.

"There were over 250 rabbis at the conference," he said.

Rabbi Altein said the response to the new learning institute has been tremendous. "There is a thirst for Jewish learning here."

He said he would like to keep class sizes to between 30 and 35 people. If registration is higher, he would offer a second class on another evening during the week.

He points out that JLI courses can be used as credits toward medical or psychology degrees.

Family recalls hiding from Nazis in Polish cave

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The popularity of reality survivor shows on television is evidence that the public loves to see people struggle against seemingly insurmountable odds.

But the story of a family of real-life survivors is more incredible than any TV show.

Amid the many stories of tragedy and heroism during World War II, the story of the Stermer family ranks among the most daring and unusual. Faced with being sent to a Jewish ghetto, the Polish family instead hid in bunkers they had built beneath their barn. From there, they made their way with two other families to a series of caves, where they found shelter and remained for 344 days underground.

The four surviving members of the Stermer family told their story at the Soloway Jewish Community Centre on Oct. 26 to launch the series of events marking Ottawa's 2008 Holocaust education program.

The story was by now familiar to many in the audience who had followed journalist Andrew Duffy's eight-part series in the Ottawa Citizen last year, or who had perhaps seen the family interviewed by Matt Lauer on NBC's Today Show.

Seeing them in person, and hearing their recollections first hand and in their own voices, was, however, compelling and extremely moving for those in the packed auditorium.

Sima Blitzer, who was a young child in the cave, introduced the audience to the many family members of the next generation who had accompanied the senior Stermers to Ottawa for the presentation.

"I am here this evening to give testimony of what happened more than 67 years ago so that Holocaust deniers cannot say that this never happened... we have to tell the story so that our children, our grandchildren and the world will know how we fought to survive," she said.

The children and grandchildren of the Stermers are productive, talented, contributing members of Canadian society, people who would not have existed if the Nazis had succeeded in their goal to kill every Jew, Sima said.

Though grateful for the lives they have led in Canada, the Stermers might not have had to endure their ordeal in the caves if Canada had been more welcoming to refugees.

In 1938, with war looming in Poland, the family applied to emigrate to Canada, but Canadian officials dragged their feet, taking their time to assess the family and issue travel permits. In the end, Hitler's army invaded Poland just a week before the Stermers were set to leave. Their emigration to Canada was, as a result, delayed by several years and much hardship.

Though their ordeal was treacherous and arduous, brothers Saul and Sam regaled the audience with stories and anecdotes that made it seem like a wonderful adventure.

Each of them praised their late mother's strength, courage and ingenuity in orchestrating the survival of 38 people in the cave.

Sima acknowledged that there were several "miracles" that helped them to survive.

"One of the miracles was that nobody ever got even a cold. If one person had been sick, we would all have died... truly, we felt it was the hand of God. It didn't just happen by itself," she said.

Young businessmen launch first Winnipeg Jewish Chamber of Commerce

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — More than 50 people attended the first event of the brand new Winnipeg Jewish Chamber of Commerce on Oct. 27.

The inaugural networking reception was hosted by community leader and businessman Bob Silver at his Western Glove Works plant in the inner city.

In his keynote address, Silver described the new organization as another step forward in welcoming new arrivals to the community and encouraging Jewish former Winnipeggers to return here.

Dave Angus, the longtime president and CEO of the Winnipeg Chamber of Commerce, spoke of the opportunities that a chamber of commerce provides for businesspeople to meet other businesspeople, as well as to develop relationships and promote their businesses.

Chamber members can also learn a lot from chamber programs and from other members' experiences, he noted.

"Welcome to the chamber movement," he said. 'We at the Winnipeg Chamber of Commerce look forward to working with you, sharing our resources with you and doing business with you."

The concept of a Jewish chamber of commerce in this city was developed by Aaron Migie and Ryan Paul, two young businessmen working in the financial services sector.

The pair, both in their mid-20s, are graduates to the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg's Club Fed, a year-long program that acquaints young Jewish adults with the work of the federation and its beneficiary agencies, with the goal of developing future community leaders.

"After finishing Club Fed about a year ago, a few of us were discussing how we could become more involved in the Jewish community," Migie said.

"Ryan and I and some others got the idea of starting a Jewish chamber of commerce as a way of bringing together business owners and professional people of all ages to network with each other, develop skills and learn from guest speakers."

Migie and Paul approached businessman and community leader Brian Scharfstein, chair of the federation's Grow Winnipeg initiative, for support, and they received his encouragement. (Grow Winnipeg aims to increase the size of the city's Jewish population by attracting immigrants and former Winnipeggers, and by persuading young Jews to remain here.)

"I have heard from many younger Jewish businesspeople who are looking for networking opportunities in Winnipeg for the purposes of trade and commerce," Scharfstein said.

He said that although the federation has provided strong support to help the new organization get off the ground – for which Paul and Migie expressed their appreciation – the new Winnipeg Jewish Chamber of Commerce intends to be self-sustaining and independent of the federation.

"Our one goal is to give back to the community," Scharfstein said.

The Winnipeg Jewish Chamber of Commerce's inaugural program was actually based on a recent Montreal Jewish Chamber of Commerce event that was also hosted by a garment factory.

The organizers here are planning quarterly programs, with a networking breakfast early in the new year next on tap.

"We have had a lot of great support from the community for this," Paul said. "Almost everyone thinks it's a great idea."

Ex-Sharon speechwriter keeps 'em laughing

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Torontonian Gregory Levey, who as a 25-year-old student served as a speechwriter for Israeli Prime Ministers Ariel Sharon and Ehud Olmert, entertained an audience of about 75 people at the Shaarey Zedek Synagogue on Oct. 23.

Levey is the author of the comical new memoir Shut Up, I'm Talking: And Other Diplomacy Lessons I Learned in the Israeli Government, which was published last April by Simon and Schuster/Free Press.

Levey told his unique and at times bizarre story of how he accidentally stumbled into the "nerve centre" of the Israeli government from 2004 until 2006.

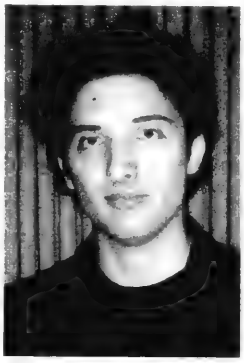
Levey, a Canadian citizen, was studying in law school in New York when he applied for an internship at the Israeli consulate there. After an Israeli named Yaron – who called him "George" – did a security check on him, and another Israeli did a further check on him, including asking him "Why I didn't break up with my girlfriend earlier," he was called to the consulate.

There, he was told that "we don't have an internship."

However, the Israeli government needed a speechwriter, so he was hired.

Levey said, "But I'm a Canadian. I can't work in the U.S."

In response, he said he was told by the Israeli diplomat, "I can hire anyone I want. All we do is call the U.S. State Department and say you're an Israeli diplomat."



Gregory Levey
[Rhonda Spivak photo]

Levey began writing speeches for the Permanent Mission of Israel to the United Nations in New York and went on to serve as senior foreign communications co-ordinator and English speechwriter for Sharon and Olmert.

"I worked for the Israeli government from the time Ariel Sharon formed Kadima, through the disengagement, his [Sharon's] two strokes, the rise of Olmert, until two days before the war in Lebanon," he said.

As Levey recalled, "A few weeks before I was going to leave work [at the mission], I got a call that Ariel Sharon was coming to New York and he was going to be giving a speech to back [the Gaza] disengagement to the United States government. It was an important speech… I was asked if I would do the first draft. [Later] I was stunned to see that he [Sharon] gave my speech pretty much word for word."

After that speech, Levey agreed to go to Jerusalem to become Sharon's speechwriter.

"The prime minister's office made the Israeli UN mission look orderly," said Levey, who is now an assistant professor of communications at Ryerson University and working on his PhD in creative writing.

The most shocking story Levey told was how he was asked to represent Israel at the UN General Assembly just minutes before a vote was to be taken.

Levey tried to communicate with the Israeli UN mission by cellphone, but couldn't get through to anyone He didn't know what the vote was about or how he was supposed to vote, so he decided to approach the senior U.S. diplomat in attendance, guessing that he should do whatever the Americans did.

"I said to [the American diplomat] that I didn't really know how I'm supposed to vote. I told him there had been some miscommunication in the Israeli mission today. Anyways, I asked him, 'How are you going to vote?… He leaned in… 'We're voting no,' he told me, and I fought back the urge to give him a high five," Levey said.

Levey said he didn't have the guts to tell the American diplomat that he didn't know what the vote was about.

"So I decided to try calling again, and this time I got through to someone at the Israeli mission who was senior enough that he should have known what the vote was about. He said he didn't know, but he'd try to get back to me.. But the vote was called [before he did]… I put my earpiece in and pressed the red button, [for] 'no' …There were over 90 votes in favour [of the resolution] and only two votes against it, those of the U.S and Greg…

"[Afterward], I got a call from a senior Israeli diplomat who said he had found out what the vote was about, and I should vote against it… Later I found out that the vote was about weapons of mass destruction."

When asked if he ever considered living in Israel, Levey answered "It's not for me. I like North America.

"Ultimately [my book] is about culture clash… I was a fish out of water."

Court rules against killing squad member

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A Federal Court judge last week declined to overturn a cabinet decision stripping killing squad interpreter Helmut Oberlander of his citizenship, but it's unlikely the Kitchener resident will be leaving Canada any time soon.

Oberlander, 84, said he planned to contest the ruling.

"We're sure going to appeal, absolutely," Oberlander told the Waterloo Region Record. "I have done nothing wrong. Why should I be deported and my citizenship taken away? I mean, it's ridiculous. It's a fraud."

In a 42-page decision released last week, Federal Court Judge Michael Phelan ruled the federal cabinet acted properly in 2007 in determining that Oberlander was complicit in war crimes and was liable to lose his citizenship.

"What is at issue here is whether a person who hid his involvement in a Nazi death squad and, therefore, gained the benefits of Canadian citizenship on which he launched a productive life should be deprived of his ill-gotten citizenship. While Oberlander's personal circumstances may be personally compelling, and the factors of time and good works are on his side, the importance of preserving the integrity of Canadian citizenship from deceit and a recognition of Canada's obligation to ensure that there is no safe haven for those involved in horrendous historical events inclines me to reject any exercise of discretion to grant a judicial review in this instance."

Oberlander was an interpreter with a Nazi killing squad, Einsatzkommando 10a (EK 10a), which was part of a larger unit that roamed Nazi-occupied territories and murdered tens of thousands of Jews and other innocent victims, the court noted. Whether he was drafted into the unit or not, he was part of it for at least one and a half years, knew of its activities and served its purpose, Phelan stated.

In reviewing a report prepared for the cabinet by the minister of citizenship, Phelan found that "the minister addressed Oberlander's claim to have been unwillingly conscripted into the unit. "In respect of conscription, the minister had reached the conclusion that conscription itself was not a conclusive factor. The minister's reasons refer specifically to the fact that Oberlander had not been mistreated after he joined EK 10a, that there was no evidence Oberlander found EK 10a's activities abhorrent, nor was there evidence he ever sought to be relieved of his duties."

The case against Oberlander dates back to January 1995, when he was first given notice that he could lose his citizenship because of allegations he obtained it by misrepresenting his wartime service. Oberlander took the case to court and a judge ruled in February 2000 that Oberlander entered Canada by lying about his wartime service with EK 10a, an SS killing unit.

Oberlander's appeal was dismissed and the minister later recommended to cabinet that his citizenship be revoked. Oberlander challenged that step and although he lost at trial, the Federal Court of Appeal overturned the revocation, saying the cabinet failed to consider Oberlander's life in Canada since 1954, nor how the case fit government policy against war criminals.

In May 2007, the cabinet again stripped Oberlander of his citizenship, and he again asked the Federal Court to review the cabinet decision. Last week's judgment found that the cabinet adequately addressed the concerns of the Federal Court of Appeal.

Helmut Oberlander stripped of citizenship, could be deported

The decision was welcomed by Jewish organizations. In a statement, Canadian Jewish Congress said it "strongly endorses" the judgment.

"The mobile killing units – the Einsatzgruppen – that followed the invading Nazi armies into Russia in 1941 were responsible… for the murder of over one million Jewish men, women and children," said Keith Landy, chair of Congress' war criminals committee. "Oberlander's presence in this country has been a continued insult to the privilege of Canadian citizenship."

"There can be no further delays in stripping Oberlander of his Canadian citizenship, which should be followed by his immediate deportation from this country," said Frank Dimant, executive vice-president of B'nai Brith Canada. "Canada must demonstrate that it will not allow itself to be a safe haven for those complicit in Nazi-era atrocities or modern-day war crimes."

Leo Adler, spokesperson for Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, noted that "the fact that it has taken 13 years of yo-yo-like court decisions to finally get Helmut Oberlander to this stage – with yet another appeal available to him – is outrageous. In the criminal justice system, the convicted get at most two applications for appeal. To allow for seemingly endless appeals… makes a mockery of the immigration process.

"The next step is to see whether this man, who ought never to have been admitted into Canada in the first place, will actually be deported – something that prior governments, majority or minority, have been unable to do."

Jewish farm colony celebrates 100th anniversary...

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — In the early 1900s, a group of Lithuanian Jews, fleeing persecution, heard about a land of freedom called Canada. They applied and were allowed to settle in western Canada.

While many got off the train when it stopped in Winnipeg, 15 adults and one child continued on to the end of the line, at Star City, Sask. From Star City, they walked into the bush as far as the Carrot River and set up a community. In 1908, the federal government recognized the new community and established a post office. That marked the official birth of Edenbridge.

On Oct. 26, 65 descendants of those early settlers and later arrivals gathered at the Shaarey Zedek Synagogue in Winnipeg to celebrate the 100th anniversary of the Jewish farm colony and to share memories of growing up there.

Sam Gordon, one of the members of the committee that organized the celebration, recalled how the original group of men who settled Edenbridge worked for the first few months in nearby Star City to make enough money to buy food and the tools to clear the land. They built the synagogue in 1908 and a public school in 1929. At its peak, he said, the community numbered 68 Jewish farm families.

After high school, though, he noted, many of the second generation left the farm. Some residents left to enlist in 1939. The population continued to decline until, by 1970, there were few people left in what had been western Canada's largest Jewish farm colony.

Freda (Fenster) Baron, a second-generation resident of Edenbridge, published a book seven years ago about growing up on the farm. At the gathering, she read excerpts from the book, recalling that her parents and older sister came to the settlement in 1908. Her older brother, Harry, was born shortly after.

"My mother used to wrap the baby [Harry] in a towel and hang the towel from a tree while she helped my father clear the trees," Baron recalled.

She told of a serious incident in which two-year-old Harry stuck a scissors in his eye. "In those years, the closest doctor was 12 miles away and the only form of transportation was by ox cart or sleigh," she said. "My father somehow got Harry to Winnipeg. It was a three-day trip by cattle car. He took Harry to the hospital, where he was initially turned away because he didn't have any money with him. He insisted on leaving Harry at the hospital. My brother lost his sight in that eye, but the doctors were able to save the eye."

Ike Vickar spent his first 25 years in Edenbridge. He recalled that the school's student body was 90 per cent Jewish. "The school was closed on Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur," he recalled.

He compared his bar mitzvah to more recent ones he has attended. "I was at one bar mitzvah that I was told cost $30,000," he said. "My bar mitzvah cost $10. It was a bitterly cold January day in 1936. We had it in our kitchen. My dad brought a Torah home. We had a minyan, including a visitor from Winnipeg. There was enough whisky left over for my cousin Harry's bar mitzvah."

Ike Vickar said that he returns to visit Edenbridge every couple of years.

Tom Springman and his wife, Hope, were back to visit two years ago. "Everything seemed so much smaller now than how I remembered it," he said.

Springman was a third-generation Edenbridge resident. He recalled families working hard under harsh conditions. "It was a time and a place where honesty and integrity were important," he said.

Entertainment was in the form of country dances, picnics and sports days.

Springman left Edenbridge in 1953 and moved to Winnipeg to pursue a teaching career.

Harry Vickar loved living in Edenbridge. He recalled that the two Vickar families – consisting of ten boys and one girl between them – shared a duplex.

"On long winter evenings, we would be outside playing hockey," he recalled. "We made our own hockey sticks and pucks.

"There were always a lot of chores to do. And we had a Hebrew teacher who would come to our house three times a week after school to teach us."

He said that his dream was to become a veterinarian, but that didn't work out. Instead, he became a car dealer, first in Melfort, Sask., then later in Winnipeg.

"My first love was always farming," Vickar said.

Harry Reiss and his family were among the last Jewish families to settle in Edenbridge. The Reiss family fled Poland in 1939, just ahead of the Holocaust.

"We barely got out of Poland," Reiss recalled. "We arrived in Edenbridge in early April. It was a cold and dreary spring. But the neighbours were warm and welcoming."

Reiss recalled the hard, sweaty work clearing the land in the summers and milking the cows. He fondly remembered berry picking and playing softball.

The Reiss family stayed in Edenbridge for eight or nine years. "I was 17 when we left," Reiss said. "I was sad to leave. I have a lifetime of fond memories and made many friends there."

Harry Reiss' brother, Sam; Marsha (Gordon) Corrin; and third-generation Edenbridge residents Frank White, Carol (Abramsky) Kravetsky and Hadda (Abramsky) Medjuck also spoke at the celebration. Norm Vickar served as the master of ceremonies.

While almost all the homes of Edenbridge are long gone, the synagogue is still standing – as a historic structure – as is the cemetery.

Former residents celebrate the 100th anniversary of the Edenbridge farm colony. Seated, from left, are Norman Vickar, Ike Vickar and Freda (Fenster) Baron. Standing, from left, are Sam Gordon, Fanny (Gordon) Lewis, Harry Reiss, Harry Vickar, Marsha (Gordon) Corrin, Ida (Reiss) Alpert, Frank White, Sam Reiss, Anne (Tabak) Mellon and Tom Springman.

...while war orphans celebrate 60 years in Canada

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Paul Herczeg, Tommy Strasser and Teddy Bolgar all adamantly insist they are 78 years old.

At least that's the age they would be if they were really under 18 when they arrived in Canada 60 years ago as Jewish war orphans.

As the three indicated in a recent interview, not all immigrants were necessarily under that 18-year age limit, which was a condition to get a much-desired visa to Canada for teens and children who were not killed in the Nazi camps.

The three friends were among some 30 survivors and their families who met Oct. 26 in the party room of a Cote St. Luc apartment building to celebrate the fact that they had not only survived in Canada, but prevailed for six decades after the government allowed in 1,123 Jewish war orphans, the vast majority from Hungary. Fewer than 40 were under 10 years old.

They were let in because Canadian Jewish Congress and other Jewish agencies, including Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS), had lobbied hard for it. And the Canadian government, with its lamentable legacy of being the country of "none is too many," reluctantly agreed to the deal, while insisting that the Jewish community pick up the entire cost of housing, feeding and finding jobs for the young newcomers.

In an interview with The CJN, the three friends said the informal gathering – the last anniversary event was the 50th – was marked by joy and laughter, and a genuine appreciation of the lives they have lived here.

"There was incredible happiness" at the event, said Herczeg, a retired importer-exporter who landed at Pier 21 in Halifax in January 1948.

Also arriving at Halifax Harbour a little later was Bolgar.

He and Herczeg had both been slave labourers in a satellite camp of the Dachau concentration camp in Mühldorf, Germany, but they didn't know each other during that time.

Strasser, who had a varied, colourful career in Montreal as a wholesaler and retailer and in real estate, had himself been part of a forced labour battalion. His life was saved by Swedish diplomat Raoul Wallenberg.

"He saved us on a death march from Budapest to Vienna," Strasser said. "He was able to make a deal to send those who were under age 18 and over age 60 back to the ghetto in Budapest."

Life in Canada for the three men was, not surprisingly, a considerable improvement over the immense suffering they and all the other orphans had endured in camps, in ghettos or in hiding. More than half of Hungary's 800,000 Jews perished in Auschwitz.

Herczeg, who was from Ujpest just outside Budapest, lost his sister and mother in Auschwitz, along with dozens of extended family members, while his father died in the Mühldorf camp.

Strasser, an only child, was from a town in Slovakia, about 90 kilometres from Budapest, whose 4,000 Jews were almost all exterminated at Auschwitz, including his parents and other family members.

Like other Europeans trying to avoid the Soviets in Europe after liberation, he went to Paris, where he lived for a few years and learned he could apply to go to Canada with the help of Congress.

"I didn't want to be in Europe anymore," Strasser said.

Bolgar, who was from a town called Sarosbatak, lost his sister and mother in Auschwitz. His father, who survived, decided to remain in Hungary, where he died in 1957.

Bolgar and Herczeg were liberated in May 1945 in Munich. Each learned of the possibility that orphans under 18 could come to Canada, and applied.

"The irony," Bolgar said, "is that if Israel had existed at that time, I would have gone there."

In Montreal, where about one-third of the orphans settled – most of the others came to Toronto, with small numbers going to Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba – the Jewish community rallied to help them. They slept at the Baron de Hirsch Institute's Herzl Family Clinic at 4650 Jeanne Mance St. and were taken to the landmark Joe Schreter's clothing store on the Main. JIAS gave them aptitude tests and they got free membership at the YM-YWHA.

Some of the orphans who came to Canada later became well known, including theatre director John Hirsch, painter Maxwell Smart and wrestlers George Reinitz and Nick Sebastien.

"We came with nothing," Herczeg recalled, noting he arrived with a sense of both elation and fear. "I came in January 1948, and went into the city, and froze my butt off!"

Jobs were found for all the orphans. Herczeg worked in a suit factory, while Bolgar got work as an electrician, even though his background was as a lady's handbag maker.

"We all jumped around a lot," Herczeg said. All eventually married and raised their own families.

They are fully aware that they didn't survive the war and have the opportunity to live full lives here because they were smarter or stronger or wilier.

"We were just lucky," Strasser said.

A creative look at Jewish women and guilt

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Ruth Andrew Ellenson, an award-winning American journalist and a 30-something Jewish woman, offers a unique twist on the word "guilt."

Her bestselling anthology, The Modern Jewish Girl's Guide to Guilt, is a collection of 28 essays by some of today's top Jewish women writers exploring their own feelings and experiences with Jewish guilt.

Ruth Ellenson

The title may sound cute, but the stories are meant to be thought provoking.

"You can win a National Jewish Book Award, and to your parents it's still not a grandchild. This is the guilt I live with," Ellenson said in introducing her own story when she spoke at Choices, an event organized by the Women's Campaign of the Jewish Federation of Ottawa on Oct. 30.

On a more serious note, Ellenson described her initial dilemma that eventually led to the compilation of essays.

Though Ellenson's father and stepmother are both Reform rabbis in the United States, her mother is a convert to Judaism, which means that Ellenson's maternal relatives are not Jewish. Born in Jerusalem and educated in the United States, she had a very strong Jewish education and upbringing. The dilemma came, she said, when she spent her summers visiting her grandmother in Lynch Station, Va.

The guilt Ellenson felt while attending church with her grandmother, all the while being acutely aware that, as an observant Jew, she should not be there, was partially assuaged by her decision to recite the Shema quietly, under her breath. While sharing this experience with a friend, she was surprised to learn that her friend had her own guilty dilemma.

"Then I started talking to another friend of mine, Rebecca Walker, the daughter of Alice Walker, who had written a book called Black, White and Jewish. Rebecca Walker's father is white and Jewish, and to add to the mix, Walker and her husband are both "black Buddhists in Brooklyn."

One by one, Ellenson collected the stories. "The idea of who we should be and the reality of who we were were in conflict," she said.

The book explores such themes as worrying about not worrying enough, dealing with Christmas trees in an interfaith home, being outed as a lesbian at your mother's Yiddish club, and hearing a grandmother's biological clock ticking.

Of course, Ellenson said, "no look at Jewish guilt would have been complete without a look at Jewish mothers."

She told the story of a mother who tried to outwit the call display feature on her daughter's telephone because she felt her daughter was avoiding her calls.

Ellenson received the National Jewish Book Award in 2006 for the anthology, published in hardcover in 2005 and in paperback in 2006. A journalist, her writing appears regularly in the New York Times, Los Angeles Times and People magazine. Increasing Israel's presence on campus a priority was to Toronto, where she spent five years as vice-consul. During that time, she became familiar with the nation's capital.

"I am excited," Ziv said. "I loved Canada when I was here before. I used to visit Ottawa and enjoyed the city.

"Canada has changed since I was here many years ago… so, since there was no Parliament in session [when I arrived], I have had time to meet various high-ranking officials," she added.

She has also been making the rounds to meet other ambassadors, as is the custom, and has been busily building her team.

In addition to the team at the embassy in Ottawa, Ziv considers the various consulates and attaches as part of her bigger team and is working to co-ordinate their activities. She plans to do a lot of travelling during her four-year term, and reach out to all provinces.

"Canada is not only Ottawa, Montreal and Toronto," she said. She will include the Jewish communities across the country in her outreach efforts and is looking forward to her first trip: she will be guest speaker at the national conference of Canadian Hadassah-WIZO in Calgary in mid-November.

Increasing Israel's presence at Canadian universities is another priority. "We hope to work with universities in Canada on issues of science and technology," Ziv said. "We want to see how we can strengthen our position there."

Recognizing that relations between Israel and Canada are, and have historically been, very good, Ziv plans to build on past successes.

"Trade has been increasing [between our countries]… We want to see how we can increase trade with the provinces," she said.

"The Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce has been revived [under the leadership of former ambassador Alan Baker], and we want to do more."

Ziv hopes to organize activities together with the Canadian government to celebrate this year's 60th anniversary of joint relations.

"We will be building on a foundation that is very strong and very stable. My role is to do as much as I can to get Israel and Canada closer – even closer," Ziv said.

Shul broadcasts Shabbat services live on web

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairie's Correspondent

WINNIPEG — It appears that Winnipeg's Shaarey Zedek Synagogue may be the first shul in the world to enable Internet users to access a live audio broadcast of its Shabbat morning services.

Through the synagogue's website at shaareyzedek.mb.ca, anyone with web access can hear a live broadcast of the services from 9 a.m. to noon every Shabbat.

The synagogue – the largest in western Canada – defines itself on its website as a "centre for Conservative Judaism."

In a phone interview with The CJN, Shaarey Zedek's chazzan, Anibal Mass, said that "the idea for doing this comes from the responsa of the Conservative movement's rabbis in a paper entitled 'Wired to the Kadosh Baruch Hu: Minyan Via The Internet.'

"In that paper, written by Rabbi Avram Israel Reisner, it was decided that it was kosher to have a person pray at home through the Internet, as long as there was an existing minyan at the synagogue service itself. Rabbi Reisner's paper was approved on March 13, 2001, by a vote [of the Conservative movement's Committee on Jewish Law and Standards] of 18 rabbis in favour, two opposed, and one abstaining."

The complete paper can be found on the synagogue's website.

Mass added: "We, at the synagogue set up our Internet [audio] broadcast before Shabbat services start on Friday. We have recording software and broadcasting software that is set up before Shabbat, and we are asking people to leave their Internet on before Shabbat, so they don't have to turn on their computer on Shabbat, and then they can tune into our services. A person can use this method to fulfil the obligation to prayer."

In his paper, Rabbi Reisner writes that "some individual Jews, far from an organized community, would wish, or need at times, to participate in communal prayers… At issue, then, is not whether one may constitute a quorum over the Internet – one may not – but whether one may respond and fulfil one's obligations from outside the quorum site if one has heard the prayer of the minyan. Here, the precedents suggest that one may, indeed, do so."

Mass, who immigrated to Winnipeg from Argentina, said that Shaarey Zedek realized it had the technology to webcast its services relatively easily.

"We already were digitally recording our services when we had a bar or bat mitzvah. We looked into it and found out that the only synagogue doing something like this was Temple Emanuel in Manhattan, which is broadcasting their Kabbalat Shabbat services through a local radio station, 93.6 FM. They post their Saturday morning services, but only after Shabbat is over," he said

According to Mass, both Shaarey Zedek's senior rabbi, Alan Green, and Lawrence Pinsker, its associate rabbi, were in favour of the webcasts.

"The ritual committee was responsive to the idea, and the board of directors approved it," Mass said

"It is a great thing for people who are sick, disabled or unable to come to synagogue. Now they can participate in hearing the service from their computer and fulfil their obligation to prayer," he added.

"But, it's not just sick people who can benefit from this. We have a lot of members who are immigrants to Winnipeg from Argentina and now even if their families can't all make it to a bar mitzvah, they can hear the service online and feel as if they are there.

"We also have a lot of immigrants from Israel, and their families in Israel can join the simchahs via the Internet if they aren't able to fly in from Israel These are benefits we hadn't entirely thought about when we set up the Internet broadcasts," he said.

Mass, who has been at Shaarey Zedek since 2002, said also that "in a community like Winnipeg, where winters are extremely cold and it can be difficult to make it to synagogue, especially for the elderly, this is a good solution."

He said the congregation is just learning about the webcasts, and "last service I know of, about nine people tuned in to the services by Internet. We've been getting very positive feedback."

Mass said the shul may consider adding video in the future, but it involves "totally different software," and is too expensive to do right now.

Denmark threatens boycott of Durban II

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Critics of the Durban II review conference may have found an ally in Europe.

The foreign minister of Denmark warned last week that unless the Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC) removes a proposal to equate criticism of religion with racism, Denmark – and perhaps other European countries – will not attend the conference, the followup to the 2001 UN anti-racism conference in Durban, South Africa, that is slated to take place in April 2009 in Geneva.

"If the OIC pushes through the draft resolution, they shall not expect European or western countries to be present at the table," Foreign Minister Per Stig Meller said during a visit to Jerusalem.

EuropeNews, citing Jyllands-Posten, reported that Meller made the same statement to Syrian and Egyptian foreign ministers during a recent swing through the Middle East. His remarks came shortly after the "Draft Outcome Document" was published at the second preparatory session as a proposal for the Durban II conference. Participants at the session include Libya, Iran and Cuba.

Discussions at preparatory meetings have raised concerns that Durban II will reprise the anti-Israel agenda of Durban I, an international anti-racism conference that became notorious for singling out Israel as a racist state.

UN Watch, a NGO that has been monitoring the preparatory conferences, said that "the dominant theme of the 88-page Durban II draft declaration (Draft Outcome Document) is that the United States, western Europe, Israel and the other liberal democracies – their principles, institutions, policies, respective histories and national identities – are singularly racist and discriminatory against Islam. Free speech, wealth, globalization, security measures to combat anti-western terrorism, all of these are attacked as causes of racism, discrimination and the 'defamation of Islam.'"

Hillel Neuer

In a telephone interview from Geneva, UN Watch executive director Hillel Neuer said the Draft Outcome Document repeats some of the language from a 2001 preparatory conference in Tehran that was introduced in Durban. It was moderated only after Israel and the United States walked out and the European Union threatened to do the same. "Only under the pressure of non-participation did the conference remove the most obscene language," he said.

The draft declaration reserves some of its most aggressive language for Israel, accusing it of practices that "constitute a serious violation of international human rights and humanitarian law, a new kind of apartheid, a crime against humanity, a form of genocide and a serious threat to international peace and security."

In all, eight provisions in the draft declaration single out Israel. "This kind of language did not surface until now. It's obscene and anti-Semitic," Neuer said.

The Danish warning, Neuer continued, "is a reminder and a wake-up call that the current draft is even worse than in 2001… It's far worse on the issues affecting the free world – the bedrock of democratic free speech coming under all-out assault."

The draft would in effect impose Islamic anti-blasphemy standards on western nations, he said.

Section 1 of the draft warns against "defamation of Muslims" while part of the section claims freedom of expression is used to mask religious defamation. The section goes on to criticize "offensive caricatures" that link Islam with violence.

The caricatures are a clear reference to a series of Danish editorial cartoons of Muhammad that triggered outrage in Muslim countries.

"The Danes are being singled out" and their opposition to the draft document "is more courageous than others," Neuer said.

Other European countries have warned against crossing EU "red lines." In mid-September, France cautioned the UN Human Rights Council, under whose auspices the preparatory meetings are held, against singling out one region in the world, attempting to prohibit the defamation of religion in order to restrict free speech and drawing up an order of priority among victims.

Neuer said that despite the warnings, "there is a well-grounded fear that the Europeans will make a compromise that will remove some of the offensive language on free speech but which will allow even more offensive language versus Israel."

York University professor Anne Bayefsky, editor of Eye On The UN, said: "The Danish foreign minister has signalled he is going to expect the OIC to back off its efforts to use the Durban II conference for an assault on freedom of expression."

However, Bayefsky said that the "EU has shown no backbone to stand up to this intimidation… The OIC is using Durban II to attack Denmark very specifically, and Denmark is sick and tired of being the whipping boy for the OIC. They know it's an attack on freedom of expression in every democracy."

Bayefsky doubted France would pull out of the conference or even be willing to moderate the worst language directed at Israel. Israel can expect little from other European states.

"The history of Europe selling Israel down the drain is a long and undistinguished one," she said.

Two Jews beaten in Paris

JTA

PARIS — A Jewish man and his nephew were beaten in a suburb southeast of Paris.

The man, 40, and his 18-year-old nephew were briefly hospitalized with minor injuries after last week's attack, which has not officially been characterized as anti-Semitic.

An anti-Semitic motive was initially strongly considered by investigators, because at least three of the five suspected attackers used anti-Jewish slurs during the Wednesday evening crime, Brigitte Franceschini, the vice-district attorney for Vitry-sur-Seine, told JTA.

Not being characterized as anti-Semitic attack

However Franceschini and the director of the region's police headquarters, Philippe Chopin, cautioned that the attack was not sparked by racism, but by a dispute between two Jewish 12-year-old cousins and about 10 other neighborhood youth, who all know each other.

The victims were badly beaten by at least two minors and three young adults ages 16 to 21, who were detained by police from Wednesday until Friday, police said.

Three young adults are being charged with committing "group violence" and using "racist insults," Chopin told JTA. It is not being characterized as an anti-Semitic attack – a move that drastically lowers the severity and punishment for the crime – because the some of the minor attackers were Jewish.

The incident comes after a handful of more severe crimes against Jews and Jewish institutions in Paris and nearby suburbs during the summer and fall. The Jewish umbrella group CRIF condemned last week's attack and underlined that it did not involve inter-ethnic Jewish and Muslim gang violence.

Beatification of Nazi-era pope likely postponed

JTA

ROME — After meeting the Pope last Thursday, Jewish leaders said the beatification of Nazi-era Pope Pius XII likely would be postponed.

Pope Benedict's move to make the controversial Pius XII a saint has outraged many Jews, who blame the late pope for staying silent in the face of Nazi atrocities and not doing more to help save Jews.

After their meeting last Thursday with the pontiff, Jewish officials said they were left with the impression that the beatification of Pius would be postponed until the Vatican opened up its World War II-era archives.

But the Pope did not say as much explicitly.

Richard Prasquier, who heads the French Jewish umbrella group CRIF, said he left with that impression from sideline discussions with Pope Benedict's entourage last Thursday, plus private conversations with the Pope.

"It wasn't said in an absolutely clear way. It was an impression that we had," Prasquier said. He said the Pope is interested in maintaining a good relationship with world Jewry.

"The Pope has no desire to be in a position of conflict," Prasquier said. "I think that the Pope realized the beautification process created a conflict with the Jewish community."

The leader of the Jewish delegation, Rabbi David Rosen, the director of the American Jewish Committee's department of inter-religious affairs, was quoted in news reports as saying Pope Benedict said in a conversation that he was "seriously considering" halting the sainthood process while Nazi-era archives on Pius remained closed.

Prasquier could not confirm that the Pope made such a statement.

Prasquier said most of the Vatican visit was devoted to explaining why technical difficulties stalled the opening of the 1939 to 1958 archives, which has been requested by Jewish officials.

"I told him I hoped the archives would help clarify things," Prasquier said. "If the archives show exemplary things about his personality, then we'll change our opinion," Prasquier said of Pius.

Pope Pius XII

Anti-Defamation League national director Abraham Foxman welcomed news that the Vatican's World War II archive may be opened.

"This is an important step toward seeking the historical truth about the pontificate of Pope Pius XII and his activities regarding the Jews during World War II. We stand ready to assist in this important project for both of our faiths," Foxman said in a statement.

Israeli economy resilient to crisis, bank chief says

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Bank of Israel Governor Stanley Fischer said Monday that Israel's economy is well placed to weather the financial turmoil that has rocked world markets, due to its relatively conservative banking system.

He said that the closely supervised Israeli banks have largely steered clear of risky mortgage investments and the complex financial instruments that have burned their counterparts elsewhere.

Briefing journalists Monday, he said the central bank expected to see Israeli economic growth slowing to 2.7 per cent in 2009 from around 4.5 per cent projected for this year.

ANCIENT HEBREW SEAL FOUND IN JERUSALEM

A Hebrew seal depicting an archer and dating to the latter part of the First Temple period was recently discovered in archeological excavations in Jerusalem. The Israel Antiquities Authority found the seal while carrying out excavations in the Western Wall plaza in Jerusalem. The seal, made of black stone, was found in a building that dates back to seventh century BCE. It belonged to a private individual. The name of the archer, "LHGB" (meaning, for Hagab) is engraved in ancient Hebrew script next to the figure. The Hebrew name Hagab is mentioned in the Bible in Ezra 2:46. The seal was sent for expert evaluation to professors Benjamin Sass of Tel Aviv University and Tali Ornan of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. According to them, the image of the archer was influenced by Assyrian wall reliefs. The seal is unique since this is the first time a private seal has been discovered that bears a Hebrew name and is decorated in the Assyrian style, an indication of the strong Assyrian influence that existed in Jerusalem in seventh century BCE. Sass and Ornant say it is usually assumed that the owners of private seals were individuals who held government positions. It is likely that the owner of this seal, Hagab – who chose to portray himself as a Hebrew archer depicted in the Assyrian style – served in a senior military role in Judah.

Four Israeli right-wing parties unite

JTA

JERUSALEM — Four of Israel's right-wing parties will unite.

The parties will present one list in its run for the Knesset in the upcoming elections under an agenda that will be lead by Jewish education, the State of Israel's Jewish identity, and Jewish morality, the new party announced in a news conference Monday.

The merging parties are the National Union, National Religious Party, Tkuma and Moledet. The National Religious Party is Israel's second-oldest political party.

The new party says it will include two "non-kippah wearers" and two women on its Knesset list, which will be chosen by a committee made up of national-religious and right-wing figures.

A new name has not yet been chosen.

Meanwhile, right-wing lawmaker Effie Eitam said he would not join the new party, announcing he planned to join the Likud. Likud Party officials told Israeli media that the party was not likely to accept Eitam.

Amid political turmoil, emigration from South Africa on rise

By SUZANNE BELLING
JTA

JOHANNESBURG — The euphoria that permeated all sectors of the South African population after the country's first democratic election in 1994 has degenerated into widespread pessimism with the forced resignation of former president Thabo Mbeki.

Mbeki, who enjoyed a good relationship with the Jewish community and presided over a once-flourishing economy, was pushed out by his own party in late September after prolonged infighting.

With the election of the controversial Jacob Zuma as president of the African National Congress (ANC) at the party's national congress at the end of last year, many young Jews are thinking about emigrating.

"I remained relatively optimistic about this country after 1994," said Evan Cohen, marketing manager for a financial services company. "Former president [Nelson] Mandela brought about the most amazing reconciliation, and under Mbeki, the economy has boomed."

Deriding what he called "a bunch of undisciplined, left-leaning populists" now leading the ANC, Cohen said, "I am concerned about the future, but as far as emigration goes, I have a wait-and-see attitude."

After levelling off for several years, Jewish emigration from South Africa is again on the rise.

While no exact statistics are available – emigres generally do not make their permanent departure official – the Israel centre at the South African Zionist Federation sees a 300 per cent increase in aliyah over last year's 178 emigrants.

Ofer Dahan, the centre's director and the aliyah emissary, said the wave of emigration comprises both "pull" factors – Zionist ideology and strong opportunities – and "push" factors.

"The 'push' is brought about by South Africans who fear for the future of this country," Dahan said. "There are some olim who have given this reason."

Of the estimated 500 people still expected to emigrate this year, many will be on specially organized flights to accommodate the high numbers.

Dahan called the first flight a "historic event" – more than 100 mostly young people departed in July.

"We have another flight of 100 people – this time families – scheduled for December and a waiting list for a third flight next year," he said, adding that "South African Jews constitute one of the best Zionist communities in the world today."

Still, said David Saks, the associate director of the South African Jewish Board of Deputies, the 2008 enrolment figures at Jewish day schools contradict perceptions of a new wave of emigration. Johannesburg has seven Jewish high schools and Cape Town one, and there are even more primary schools. More than 80 per cent of Jewish children have attended Jewish schools since the 1970s.

In February, Saks described the community as numerically stable, cohesive and extremely well-organized, although "the consequences of a net outflow of Jews from the country since the 1980s will be with us for many years."

Despite increased emigration, he said the actual numbers of Jews in South Africa in recent years has changed little because of the increased birth rate, emigres returning and the influx of Jews from Zimbabwe.

From a peak of 120,000 in the 1970s, the South African Jewish population has declined to approximately 75,000 today, with more than 50,000 in Johannesburg and 16,000 in Cape Town. Since 2000, nearly half of the Jewish emigres have gone to Australia (44 per cent), followed by the United States (18 per cent), Israel (12 per cent) and Canada (nine per cent).

Saks said South African Jewry is considerably better off than most of its Diaspora counterparts with regard to assimilation and anti-Semitism, the two most serious problems facing Jewish communities outside Israel. The intermarriage rate is no more than 10 per cent.

While there are "strong pockets of anti-Semitism," he said, "these rarely translate into actual anti-Semitic actions."

The organized community's leaders remain confident about the future.

"There is no cause for panic," said Zev Krengel, national chair of the Jewish Board of Deputies, which met with Zuma only days before Mbeki's departure.

"The ANC hasn't changed its policies toward minorities in this country. Mbeki had an open door for us and Zuma, too, was very receptive. The whole process is part of our democracy and change, which always creates a certain level of uncertainty, just as it does in any business."

Zuma faces possible prosecution for alleged fraud and racketeering related to his role in a controversial multibillion-dollar arms deal with foreign suppliers while he served as the country's deputy president under Mbeki.

> Organized community's leaders remain confident about the future

On Sept. 25, Parliament elected Zuma's deputy in the ANC, Kgalema Motlanthe, as the new president – an unofficial caretaker post. Zuma himself is expected to take over after the general elections in the first half of 2009.

"Motlanthe has met socially and officially with the community leaders and is liked by them," Saks said. "The fears regarding Zuma as his permanent successor are more about his supporters – the corrupt populace."

Motlanthe sent New Year's greetings to the Jewish community, which were well received.

"Mbeki's going is just another tumble in the tug of war that our country has become," said Ruth Rabinowitz, a member of Parliament for the Inkatha Freedom Party. "Our top-down system of co-operative governance has engendered a confusing political system filled with duplication – hence remarkable for its inefficiency, lack of transparency or accountability. Money, power and populism have become our country's hallmarks."

Not everyone sees Mbeki's demise as a loss for the country. The former head of the official Opposition, Democratic Alliance, Tony Leon, told JTA that the future of the Jewish community is tied to the middle-class white community.

Leon, a longtime political and at times personal opponent of Mbeki, has been in demand on Jewish and public platforms to provide his assessment of the situation.

"I know that many in the opposition-minded community view current events with dismay, and the looming arrival of Jacob Zuma with roughly the level of enthusiasm with which the Romans greeted the Visigoths," he said.

While Leon credited Mbeki with providing some economic stability in South Africa, he faulted him for squandering the political and diplomatic gains of his predecessor, Mandela.

Lionel Stein, former chair of the Community Police Forum Area Board devoted to combating the high level of crime, was upbeat about the prospect of Zuma as president of South Africa.

"I think for the first time in the past 10 years, we will have a leadership that will put its attention into fighting crime, getting to the root cause of the problem, and which will do something about it," Stein said.

"Zuma is a true politician who knows how to rally for the people. It won't matter to him if they are Jews, Muslims or Zulus – any sector of the population – he will be able to gain their confidence."

On the eve of her emigration to Sydney, Australia, Galia Durbach told JTA she had serious concerns about the country.

"I don't get the sense that leaders are tackling some of the core issues," said Durbach, a banking executive who left earlier this month with her husband, Steve, an academic, and two young children.

Durbach said she sees ongoing "fundamental problems" in addressing education and alleviating poverty, and that this contributes to the high crime rate.

Israel Briefs

Elections Feb. 10.

Knesset Speaker Dalia Itzik announced that most of Israel's political parties agreed that the next general election will be Feb. 10. The vote was supposed to be in 2010, but Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's resignation announcement in July led to early elections. Kadima leader Tzipi Livni said her main leadership rival, Transportation Minister Shaul Mofaz, would be her party's campaign chair. Along with Livni, the main contenders for prime minister are Defence Minister Ehud Barak of Labor and Likud opposition leader Benjamin Netanyahu.

Livni cites Syria conditions

After reports that outgoing Prime Minister Ehud Olmert intends to resume indirect peace talks with Syria, Kadima chair Tzipi Livni on Friday asserted that Damascus must sever its ties with Iran and Hezbollah before Israel accedes to its demands. "Before the Syrians get from us what they want, they must show through their actions that they intend to stop arming Hezbollah, and must cut ties with Iran and terrorism," Army Radio quoted her as saying. Livni also said Friday that the government "must determine if we are talking about continuing just the talks or determining facts on the ground before elections, something that is not appropriate or acceptable. The government needs at this time to focus on the management of the country and find solutions to the problems facing us right now, nothing more than this," Livni added.

Gaza truce violation

Palestinians on Friday fired two anti-tank missiles at Israeli troops along the Gaza border, a violation of a four-month-old truce, the Israel Defence Forces said. Troops investigating suspicious movements along the fence near the Kissufim crossing came under fire from inside Gaza, the army said. There were no injuries or any immediate claim of responsibility from any Palestinians. The violation was the second by the Palestinians in two days. On Thursday, a little-known group calling itself Hezbollah Palestine claimed responsibility for firing a rocket into southern Israel from Gaza.

Museum gets go-ahead

The Simon Wiesenthal Center can build its long-planned Center for Human Dignity-Museum of Tolerance in Jerusalem. The Supreme Court gave its approval eight years after the museum was announced. Famed architect Frank Gehry will design it. In the interim, the cost of the project soared from $120 million to $250 million (US). Rabbi Marvin Hier, dean of the Wiesenthal Center, said construction would resume immediately and estimated that the museum in the middle of Jerusalem would open in 3-1/2 years. Its site, adjoining Independence Park, was Jerusalem's main Muslim cemetery until 1948. Muslim authorities appealed to the Supreme Court that construction would desecrate the cemetery, which is said to contain the bones of Muslims killed during Crusades.

Filmmaker documents family's garbage disaster

By RIVA GOLD
Special to The CJN

Foul odour and fruit flies can result from forgetting to take out the garbage on garbage day.

But what happens when a family of five misses the garbage truck for three months?

Garbage! The Revolution Starts at Home simulates exactly this disaster. The new documentary, produced and directed by Toronto-native Andrew Nisker, exposes the dirty side of garbage, both at home and at the dumpster.

The film documents the McDonalds, an ordinary family that is asked to keep all their garbage for three months. It then follows them on a journey to find out where the garbage goes and what it's doing to the world after it leaves their home.

"It's about the pollution a typical household creates," Nisker says. "And it isn't just garbage – it's where waste water goes, and what happens outside their home to get their coal power energy. We even looked at some of the things [that accumulate] over the holidays, just by celebrating."

Nisker hopes the film will raise environmental consciousness.

"I want to make people more aware of pollution activities that are basically invisible to us because of the way the system is set up," he says. "The garbageman takes everything away, so it's easy to miss what we're really doing."

For Nisker, poor air quality has been both a global and personal problem.

"I grew up asthmatic in Toronto, and even as a kid, I had to pay every day just to breathe. It makes you think about why you're doing that. We drive cars that emit so much pollution, yet the technology is barely evolving. Why do we just accept the poor air quality?"

Andrew developed the idea for the film in 2002 at the peak of the Toronto garbage strike. The strike, which lasted two weeks, covered the entire city in mounds of rotting waste. "They were piling up garbage by the park near my home. I looked at what we were doing to that park, and I wanted to capture that feeling in a film," Nisker says.

Though this was his first feature-length documentary, Nisker is not new to the entertainment industry. A graduate of York University, he has produced a myriad of interactive entertainment products, including interactive DVD board games and children's programming.

The title of Nisker's new film pays tribute to Nisker's late friend Robert Hunter, the co-founder of Greenpeace, who came up with the expression "the revolution does start at home."

Nisker says, "If you can't clean up your own home, it'll be hard to expect the rest of the world to do anything. It has to begin at home, with individuals and families."

The film has seen major commercial success, with screenings in more than 120 communities worldwide. Nisker is distributing the film himself. It has primarily been viewed at large "screening parties" from Toronto to Torino, Italy. The film has also been selected to screen at Toronto's Hot Docs International Film Festival next spring and has been shown at more than 120 schools worldwide.

"The Jewish community, of course, has been very supportive of the project," Nisker says. The Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre hosted a special screening last April, and the film has also received rave reviews in Israel. Nisker is currently negotiating a broadcasting deal with an Israeli network.

"The reactions from everyone have been fantastic," Nisker notes. "The highest compliment we get is when people spread the revolution alongside the film."

Since the film's debut, several groups have emulated the McDonald project and done their own garbage audits.

"People start talking, because everybody lives in a home, and everybody creates garbage. It's a universal thing we can all do better."

According to Nisker, there are "1001 ways" each household can reduce. He suggests primarily a much more critical eye when shopping, and encourages viewers to reconsider their product packaging.

The McDonald family have started to do their part by using fewer harsh chemical cleaners and using tap water instead of bottled water.

The garbage-revolution movement also identifies ways to make the holiday seasons more environmentally friendly.

At Chanukah, Nisker suggests sending e-cards, instead of paper ones; giving gifts in reusable bags; and using china cups instead of disposables.

"Disposable flatware is a major problem," Nisker says. "It's convenient, but it's very harmful. I think all of us can re-think our holiday traditions and make them a little greener."

The documentary itself is only one part of the growing international garbage movement.

The film's website, www.garbagerevolution.com, has spawned an online community of more than 5,000 members devoted to waste reduction.

"It's kind of like an eco-YouTube," Nisker jokes.

The site offers members more information about the issues in the film, monthly newsletters and extra footage from the movie. Members can also contribute to Garbage2!, a new film composed of user-submitted ideas about how to reduce garbage in different communities. Garbagerevolution.com will soon also host an online store of eco-friendly products.

Despite the serious message behind the film, Nisker stresses that it is largely intended to be entertaining.

"It's important to present issues in a way that people will pay attention to. There are many great environmental films out there, that aren't necessarily doing that well commercially. If you don't do that, you don't get your message across."

For Nisker, the eyes of the McDonald family kept the story fun and relatable.

"Surviving while keeping all your garbage can be very entertaining," he says.

Currently, Nisker is working on his second feature film, Chemical Nation. The film's subject is household cleaning chemicals and how they impact the environment and people's health. It is expected to be released in late 2009.

Actor's book gives voice to victims of war and injustice

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

She's won critical acclaim as an actor for movie roles, including playing a stripper in Atom Egoyan's 1994 film Exotica, and is probably best known for her role as Jenny Schecter, a moody lesbian, on Showtime's The L Word.

But 33-year-old Mia Kirshner said that I Live Here, a "paper documentary" she authored, is the best thing she's ever done.

Kirshner, who visited her hometown Toronto late last month to promote her book at the International Festival of Authors at the Harbourfront Centre, has spent the last seven years documenting her travels to war-torn and poverty-stricken regions around the world.

I Live Here, co-authored by J.B. MacKinnon, Paul Shoebridge and Michael Simons, is broken up into four volumes, each consisting of journal entries, photographs, art and graphic novellas that tell stories about child soldiers, sex workers and genocide in Burma, war in Chechnya, AIDS and poverty in Malawi, and murder and injustice in Mexico.

Kirshner's sister, Lauren, and authors Ann-Marie MacDonald and Karen Connelly, as well as the subjects themselves, contributed to the book.

"I'm proud of The L Word because it is a meaningful show to a lot of women, and I'm proud to be part of something like that... but making the book was like running a marathon up a hill with weights strapped to you... The travelling itself was inspiring, and it changed my life completely," Kirshner said about her experience.

"It feels incredible. I don't think I've ever done anything well before this. I don't mean to sound full of myself, I don't mean that the book is the best book ever or anything like that, but it's a very new feeling for me to think that I did a good job and that I've accurately reflected the stories I was told."

Proceeds from the book, which was published by Pantheon for less than the usual fee so the book could be sold at a lower price point, go to Amnesty International.

"What I'd like people to do with this book, for a book like this to be a success, if you have the book and you like it and you believe in its message, e-mail your friends and tell them why its important," Kirshner said during an interview with The CJN at Toronto's Westin Harbour Castle.

Actor Mia Kirshner said the book she spent seven years putting together is the best thing she's ever done.

[Mike Bender photo]

Kirshner, who just finished filming the sixth and final season of The L Word, said it was the 2001 terror attack on the World Trade Centre in New York that triggered the project.

"I just remember I was working in Vancouver, feeling creatively dead, and then 9-11 happened and basically it just changed my whole life. I was really scared. I felt like I really wanted to understand where we all were going."

She spent a year doing extensive research, convincing others to join her project and preparing for her first trip to Ingushetia, a Russian republic in the North Caucasus region.

She was 26 when she made her first trip, and her parents were concerned about her decision to travel there.

"My dad called me the day before I went to Ingushetia and he said, 'I really think you're making a mistake. A plane was just shot down in a neighbouring region and I don't want you to go.' But I said, 'Dad, I'm going. I have to.' "

Ironically, Kirshner said it was her parents and grandparents who influenced her decision to give voice to victims of war and injustice.

Her grandparents are Holocaust survivors and her father, Sheldon, a reporter at The CJN, was born in a German displaced persons' camp, and her mother, an ESL teacher, immigrated from Bulgaria after the war.

"The house I grew up in was sort of this tapestry of colour and culture and language and music and melancholy. And I mean melancholy for the former life in many ways," Kirshner said.

In the first volume of I Live Here, which documents her visit to Ingushetia, Kirshner shares the effect war and genocide had on her own family.

"As a child, we were always at my grandparents' house for our Friday night Shabbat dinner," she wrote. "Hazy from stolen gulps of Manischewitz, I would watch my grandfather vanish. His eyes dark slits, mouth open in mute horror. Sometimes, he would stop talking for days."

Seeing first-hand how horrific memories can affect a person, Kirshner feels it's important for survivors to document their experiences.

"After a certain point, after the first trip to Ingushetia, I felt a responsibility to tell the stories."

Although she didn't want to brand her seven years of travelling to Chechnya, Burma, Mexico and Malawi as dangerous, Kirshner said there were encounters that left her feeling vulnerable.

While visiting a brothel that operates out of a noodle shop in Mae Sot, a town on the Thai-Burmese border, she wrote: "The door was locked behind us. It's hard not to feel vulnerable in a locked room. I have been told to be careful – a western man was shot in this brothel last week."

She said that on another occasion, when she and her guide tried to make their way back into Mae Sot, they were stopped and searched by the Thai military.

"They thought I was a Christian missionary, and they had been questioning whether I had been talking to child soldiers. And how would they know that? Were they following us? Because that was actually what I had been doing the day before."

Despite the horrific stories she heard in Chechnya and Burma, Kirshner found Juarez, Mexico, the most painful trip to make, she said.

Over the past 15 years, more than 400 cases of women having been raped, tortured and murdered have gone unsolved in Juarez because of the complicity of police and politicians, Kirshner said.

"I sat in a room with mothers whose daughters had been killed savagely along with eight other women in a cotton field, and the Mexican government has lost evidence over the past 10 years, haven't found the killer or killers, and I think it is absolutely appalling that they haven't allowed these families closure."

The fourth volume of her book documents her trip to Malawi, and although it is one of the poorest countries in the world and it had one of the highest HIV rates, Kirshner said she found inspiration there.

"I saw a young women named Miriam who is HIV-positive and doesn't complain, she works at a gas station, supports her family and became a role model for me, like the way in which she just brings a simple grace into her life and dignity, and laughs all the time. You can't help but take that back into your own life," she said.

"I think this experience made me a better person. I think it made me a better friend. I think it made me a better daughter... It really humbles you and when you realize how precious time is... and how everything is so fleeting, the time you have together should be cherished."

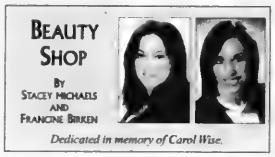
With the success of her first book, Kirshner plans to author another series and is considering travelling to Pakistan and Iran.

Meanwhile, the I Live Here Foundation was founded to establish creative writing programs for marginalized people. Its first project will be to fund a writing program in Malawi for orphaned children living in a juvenile prison.

The I Live Here Foundation's website address is www.i-live-here.com.

As winter approaches, we often believe that the skin-care routine we used in the spring and summer months should be the same in the winter months.

The reality is, winter brings on new challenges for us and our beauty regimen has to change to accommodate the colder temperatures. Winter has a drying effect on our skin and hair. We can keep our skin healthy and glowing by being aware of what changes we need to make and how we can avoid red raw skin and chapped lips.



Natural sunscreens that feature aloe vera and herbal oils will help protect the skin's layers. Before your outdoor activities begin, make sure to use a sunscreen that has at least a SPF 15.

Moisturizing your skin twice a day is a must! Before your day begins, make sure to use a heavier moisturizer than you used in the summer. You don't have to change the line of skin care you have been using; just change the formulation. Lotions that contain AHA, glycolic acid and lactic acid are amazing to use this time of year, as they are effective for reversing dry skin and helping reduce the appearance of fine lines.

When showering or bathing, try not to use harsh soaps and try to stay away from bubble baths, which can be irritating to dry skin. Look for bath products that have chamomile in them, as it is a healing agent. After you enjoy your warm (not hot) shower, make sure to put on your moisturizer. You will feel fresh and rejuvenated.

Chapped lips are common in the winter months. Use a lip balm with at least SPF 15 and try to find products that have beeswax, aloe and Vitamin E in them. Tea tree oil is wonderful for lips that are cracked and sore.

Exfoliating your skin, including your hands and feet, is another concern during the winter months. The most important thing for skin is good nutrition. Eating dark green leafy vegetables can help prevent skin dryness and other problems. Take your vitamins, try drinking warm water, as this is great for the digestive system, and stay warm. Continue to work out for 20 minutes while watching your favourite program. This is the toughest time of year to get used to, but if you follow all these wonderful tips, the cold temperatures will not feel as bad as you think.

FIORIO – Maurice Fiorio tells us that for winter, hairstyles are short, as short cuts can make you look younger and bring out facial features, yet they are still sexy and feminine. Incorporate a fringe if you want to draw attention to the eyes, and layering will give you that tousled yet sexy look.

Colour should be natural with tone on tone colour. Blonds will look great with lowlights; warm brunettes and reds look good with delicate golden highlights. Skin tends to be paler in the winter, so stay neutral with colour; in other words, don't go too light or too dark for your skin tone.

Hair styles should be sleek and dimensional to accentuate jaw lines and cheekbones. Use a product that creates shine, backcomb your hair at the crown of the head and pull it back off the face using bobby pins

Bring the bounce back to curly hair with Tweek from Curly Hair Solutions, an innovative hairspray in a cream form that fine-tunes curly hair by rebuilding flat spots, fixing hat/helmet head and instantly eliminating flyaway hair. Tweek is a styling cream that does for curly hair what hairspray does for straight hair. It is a versatile product that can be used for several different applications. Tweek is flexible, non-sticky, non-greasy and water-soluble, with just the correct strength to refresh and support curly hair without causing damage. It does not contain drying alcohol or silicones, which can build up on the hair, and has a nice clean, natural scent.

Natural and organic body-care company Kiss My Face Kids' products makes bath time fun. The company is expanding its global reach with new, totally natural kids' bath and body products. Pamper your kids during bath time with essential products ranging from shampoos and body washes to hair detanglers and toothpastes. These kid friendly products contain no parabens or artificial colours and come in fun flavours to ensure your kids' sensitive skin stays soft, smooth and squeaky clean. Each of these products comes with an endangered animal friend such as Walter the Whale and Chi Chi the Chimpanzee, perfect for getting the kids' attention.

FRANCINE'S TIPS

Glamour and drama is the look for this winter's makeup. Emphasis is on either the eyes or lips, but not both. The smoky look is still in fashion and hotter than ever. Purple, berry, blue, gold and bronze are also hot in eye shadow colours.

Be prepared to see lots of black eyeliner. The "cat eyes" look is what is on this season's runway. It can be achieved by lining the entire eye with a dark shade of liner, usually black, dark brown or grey. The liner is extended just beyond the outer corner of the eye in an upward direction to give that sensual look.

To complete this look, make sure the eyebrows are full and lashes are longer then ever. Apply multiple coats of dark mascara. Aubergine is the hot shade if you are looking for purple-tinted lashes. Then invest in a good waterproof mascara.

Mineral makeup continues to be a hot trend. The natural even look is what every women wants, and this is the makeup to be looking for. During winter months, the skin becomes paler than in other seasons, so make sure you test a foundation before you purchase it. The very same applies to concealer. The concealer should match your skin tone and should be applied over dark circles under the eyes and red spots.

This season, the emphasis is on highlighting cheekbones in pink. Use your blush brush to sculpt your face and create cheekbones.

Lips are either bright and vibrant or neutral and subdued. Every shade of red is hot; try to find a shade that will flatter your look, especially for that black-tie evening. There are several different shades of red. Fair-skinned women should wear pink or plum lipsticks with red undertones. For dark skin tones, try deep warm reds and, for medium skin tones, anything that is berry or cherry will look amazing. Choose the look you are after, red lips or dramatic eyes, and tackle it. Just remember not to overdo it.

As we know, winter can be extremely cold and hard to get used to. This is your opportunity to warm up with fresh, new scents that can make you smell and feel wonderful. Fragrances that should be worn in the winter months are cypress perfumes with a sharp woody scent. They promote warmth and give off a feeling of heat.

Dress yourself up with all the new, wonderful colours of winter, and remember your appearance is most important and should be enhanced in the proper way. So take advantage of all these wonderful hints and hold your head high. You will not only feel amazing, but you will look it, too.

Hair extension trend continues to grow

Spa Life
By Kathryn Kates

For years, starlets have been adding length and volume to their tresses with hair extensions.

The trend has now caught on with women of all ages and from all walks of life who want highlights or lowlights without the expense and damage of chemicals or fuller or better textured hair for a more youthful look. Although extensions can restore the appearance of damaged hair, they are used most often to add length.

According to Dawn Rivard, an expert on wigs, hair extensions, hairstyling and makeup, and owner of Dawn Rivard's Hair & Make-up Design – a home-based Toronto studio – hair extensions give women the opportunity to break away from the hair that has bound them to a specific look.

Rivard knows hair. She has worked throughout Europe, North America and New Zealand, and her work has been seen in theatre productions, operas, on TV shows, in movies, on CD covers and in magazines. She has garnered many prestigious awards, including an Emmy for Showtime's production of Anne Rice's Feast of All Saints.

She's applied extensions to actress Kirstie Alley, television talk-show host Sharon Caddy and Canadian Idol judge and singer Sass Jordon.

"I am one of only two Canadians certified with Mark Barrington Concepts Inc., a strand-by-strand reusable hair extensions method from the United States. I am also certified with other hair extension systems – Great Lengths, Hair Police and So.Cap," Rivard says.

She works with high-quality human hair in a choice of straight, curly or dreadlock textures. Some clients mix textures such as partial dreads or mix systems like Mark Barrington in the back because they like the smoothness but want a smaller bond (used to attach the hair) at the front, so she uses So.Cap.

Kathryn Kates after her hair extension.

Rivard's clients include those whose hair is fine or thinning due to aging and who want to thicken it. Eventually, most of these women end up wanting to add length, too, she says. Her clientele range in age from 17 to 65. Ten per cent of Rivard's clientele consists of men who come not for length but for thickening when balding begins.

"At the first session, I assess what system will be best for the client because there is no one system that suits everybody," says Rivard. "I match the hair and how the hair attaches to the person's head, so it works with their hair's texture, lifestyle and maintenance system. On the second visit, I install the hair."

Sometimes she can install clients' hair on a first visit, if she happens to have hair that matches their hair, but in most cases the hair has to be custom-ordered. It can take a day from a local supplier such as So.Cap or up to two weeks for more difficult hair, if the texture of the client's hair isn't common or the colour is harder to match.

On average, it takes four hours to install a head of hair. Depending on the amount of hair used, a full head of hair costs between $500 and $1,500. Upkeep, depending on how many extensions are worn and how tight the extensions are applied, usually entails salon visits for one to two hours every six to 10 weeks. According to Rivard, a tight installation keeps the hair looking fresher longer.

The hair extension trend continues to grow, and not only to get extra length. When popular styles like the shorter bob came in, many women added extensions for volume and highlights.

"Your own hair will be in better shape after you have worn extensions," Rivard says. "I'm not saying hair extensions help your hair grow, but much less of your own hair breaks when wearing extensions."

Rivard cautions that people wanting extensions need to get a referral and check the references of a hairstylist, because even the best hair extension system, if put on wrong, can harm your hair. If stylists won't explain why they are using a particular system, then they are just selling the only system they know, she says.

Regarding removing extensions, Rivard says, "With the Mark Barrington extensions, people can remove them on their own. It won't cause any damage, although it is a little tricky – a stylist can take them out within a half hour. The other systems need a stylist to remove them. To remove a whole head, takes about an hour."

Rivard's website address is www.dawnrivard.com.

Journalist Rebecca Eckler turns to fiction writing

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Rebecca Eckler appears to have made the tough transition from journalist to novelist with a minimum of fuss and pain.

"Journalism was great, but I always thought I'd be a fiction writer," said Eckler, a former National Post columnist who has written several books since her departure from the grind of daily journalism. "I have an active imagination, and a novel seemed like a good challenge."

In the past four years, Eckler, a 35-year-old single mother, has churned out three "mumoirs" about the joys and challenges of motherhood – Knocked Up: Confessions of a Hip Mother-to-Be, Wiped! and Toddlers Gone Wild.

And now she has produced her first work of fiction, Rotten Apple, a novel for young readers published by Doubleday Canada.

Eckler is busy these days.

She is three-quarters of the way through finishing her second teen novel. As well, she is working on her first adult novel, turning on a mother-daughter relationship.

In addition, she and co-author Erica Ehm are writing a series of three kids' book, The Mischievous Mom, the first of which is due to to released by Key Porter in 2009.

And Eckler continues to dabble in journalism, contributing lifestyle stories to newspapers ranging from the National Post to the Globe and Mail and to magazines such as Maclean's and Chatelaine.

Eventually, she hopes to be a full-time novelist, but she has no intention of giving up journalism altogether. "In journalism, you meet a lot of people, and that's real life," she explained in an interview.

Born and raised in Toronto and educated at Ryerson University, Eckler was drawn to writing Rotten Apple – revolving around a girl's attempts to deal with peer pressure and first love – because she regards the teen years as both magical and painful.

I've grown to love Apple," she said in a reference to the main character, Apple Berg. "She feels like my child. I watched Apple as I created her."

Eckler said that Apple percolated in her mind as she wrote her mumoirs, which have sold briskly and been translated into several languages.

For all her enthusiasm about Rotten Apple, she is also modest. "It's a fun, light read. I won't win the Nobel Prize for it."

Eckler, whose five-year-old daughter, Rowan, is the apple of her eye, conceived her with a Toronto-born lawyer who lives in Calgary, Stephen Chetner. "We're not together today, but we have a good relationship, and he plays an active role in bringing up Rowan," said Eckler, who divided her time between Toronto and Calgary from 2003 to 2007, but who is now based in Toronto again after buying a house here last summer. "We're all pretty close, and it's good to have him around."

Having praised her ex-fiancé's cooperative attitude, she acknowledged that being a single mom is difficult and exhausting, even though Rowan is an amazing little girl who gives her much happiness and pleasure.

Eckler, an elfin figure with lustrous, long dark brown hair, launched her career while studying broadcast journalism at Ryerson in the mid-1990s. "I always wanted to be a writer," she said.

She was an intern at the Calgary Herald, covering arts and entertainment, and she worked as a producer for the television program Pamela Wallin Live.

"Pamela was the best boss I ever had," she said. "She gave me such a good work ethic. We're still in touch."

Eckler, whose forte is "personal journalism," was hired by the new National Post, published by Conrad Black, on its first day of publication in the autumn of 1998.

By chance, she had written a profile about its editor, Ken Whyte, five years earlier and had sent him her Calgary Herald clippings.

She applied for an editorial position at the National Post because she was convinced it would be a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity. As she put it, "I don't think there will ever be another newspaper startup like this in Canada."

Writer Rebecca Eckler

Initially, Eckler contributed stories to the Toronto section, but as time went on she began to write lifestyle pieces, which suited her interests and temperament.

Six months into her job, while covering a federal election and after writing a story that impressed the editor, Eckler learned that she would be promoted to columnist.

Specializing in soft human interest stories, she was eminently prolific, sometimes writing two columns a day. "It was such a blast to work there for the first few years," recalled Eckler, who was virtually married to her job. "I had very good editors who were on the same wavelength."

As she looks back, she said that her favourite columns were on a surfing camp in California, the Canadian federal election and the Hollywood movie scene.

Readily admitting that she was a master of fluff, she said, "I love fluff. People don't give it enough credit. Fluff is what gets people talking, though I admire reporters who have gone to Rwanda and Afghanistan."

In 2005, she was abruptly fired, the victim of a brutal round of cutbacks. She was not too surprised. "A lot of good people already had been let go."

Nonetheless, she took the termination badly. "It was awful and unfair. I had really worked so hard. It soured me on the business side of journalism. I realized that newspapers are nothing but a business."

To soften the blow, the Post offered to pay her per column in lieu of a regular salary. She continued writing for the Post, but quit two months later.

Subsequently, Eckler freelanced for a variety of publications, including the Globe and Mail and Post City magazine.

Though this incident still rankles, Eckler firmly believes that the Post brought a sense of fun and elan to Canadian journalism, especially in feature writing, and forced competitors like the Globe and Mail to improve themselves.

Eckler, whose parents Lorne and Susan are retired teachers, is a liberal in her social and political values. But in last month's federal election, in line with an emerging trend in Canada's Jewish community, she voted for the Conservative party, led by Prime Minister Stephen Harper.

Eckler, whose brother, Michael, lives in a settlement just inside the West Bank, cast her ballot for the Conservatives because she thinks they're more pro-Israel than the other mainstream parties.

Having visited Israel many times since the age of 16, Eckler feels comfortable there. "I really feel at home in Israel."

Kristallnacht paved the way to the Holocaust

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

In an orgy of anti-Semitic violence and hatred, mobs ran amok throughout Germany and newly annexed Austria on Nov. 9 and 10, 1938 – killing at least 96 Jews, injuring hundreds more, burning 1,300 synagogues, vandalizing schools, institutions and cemeteries and wrecking some 7,500 Jewish-owned businesses. In addition, 30,000 Jews were arrested and sent to concentration camps.

Exactly 70 years ago this week, Kristallnacht broke out in Germany, an ugly precursor to the Holocaust. By even Nazi standards, it was a unique event, according to British historian Ian Kershaw. "It was the only occasion during the Third Reich when the German public was confronted directly, on a nation-wide scale, with the full savagery of the attack on the Jews," he writes. "Never before and never again did the persecution of the Jews stand at the forefront of the public's attention…"

Herschel Grynszpan

Ernst vom Rath

This telling quotation appears in Mitchell Bard's illuminating book, 48 Hours of Kristallnacht: Night of Destruction/Dawn of the Holocaust (The Lyons Press), which is largely based on eyewitness testimony, some of it previously unpublished. These chilling accounts are supplemented by Bard's supple analysis of what came before, during and after this shocking, brutal outburst of primitive anti-Semitism.

The official persecution of German Jews actually began in the wake of Adolf Hitler's accession to power in January 1933. A boycott of Jewish businesses, in April of that seminal year, was followed by a dizzying succession of anti-Jewish legislation, including the 1936 Nuremberg laws, which stripped Jews of citizenship and barred them from marrying Christians.

There was a respite as Germany hosted the summer Olympic Games, but once the foreign athletes left, the Nazis redoubled their efforts to harass, demonize, marginalize and isolate Jews.

As part of this ferocious campaign, Germany, on Oct. 27, 1938, expelled 18,000 stateless Polish Jews. The Grynszpan family, which had lived in Hanover for the previous 27 years, were among the deportees. The Grynszpan's eldest son, Herschel, a resident of Paris, was outraged by the inhumane treatment his parents and sister had received. Seeking revenge, he went to the German embassy and asked if he could present an important document to the ambassador.

Since he had stepped out, Grynszpan was led to the third secretary, Ernst vom Rath, who was under investigation by the Gestapo because he was suspected of lacking sufficient Nazi zealotry, particularly toward Jews.

Grynszpan fired five shots at close range, mortally wounding the diplomat, who died on Nov. 9, the 15th anniversary of Hitler's Beer Hall Putsch, a holy day in the Nazi calendar.

Bard says that Joseph Goebbels, the fanatical Nazi propaganda minister, took full advantage of his death to ramp up the persecution of Jews to a new level, adding that Hitler left the details to his subordinates. Although the systematic attacks started on Nov. 9, the first wave of violence washed over the German cities of Kassel and Magdeburg-Anhalt about a day before Vom Rath succumbed to his wounds.

As might be expected, the sheer scale and horror of Kristallnacht is best described by the people who witnessed it, and much to his credit, Bard has assembled a trove of powerful testimony.

Robert Behr, a Berliner, recalls: "As I went out of the house, I saw all the stores were smashed and Nazi stormtroopers in their brown uniforms. Police stood around and didn't do anything. Berlin had always been a liberal city. Suddenly all that changed. Berliners turned out to be no different than anyone else."

A fire consumes a synagogue in Berlin.

Sophie Nussbaum, from Emden, was awakened by knocks at the door and shouting. "Open up! We're taking all of you to Palestine." She clearly remembers the traumatic effect Kristallnacht had on a girl who had been raised as a Christian by her Jewish father and her non-Jewish mother. "But mommy," she cried, "we are not Jewish."

Alexander Lebenstein of Haltern heard strangers running into his house and throwing furniture, glassware and dinnerware out of windows.

Frederick Firnbacher of Straubing saw civilians ransacking the local synagogue and trying to break into homes where Jews lived.

Arnold Fleischmann, a resident of Bayreuth, who happened to be in Nuremberg on one of those ignominious days, says his father and his friend were shaken up by the boiling animus. "They never believed something like that could happen in a Germany that was civilized, that believed in Goethe and Schiller."

Jutta Rose of Hanover witnessed the indignity of an assault on her father. "They threw [him] down the stairs. Blood was all over."

Harry Stern, president of the B'nai Brith lodge in Erfurt, was taken to a gymnasium and hauled into a restroom, where he was forced to walk with bended knees, "the worst torture I have endured…"

In the village of Kehl, close to the French city of Strasbourg, Jews were marched through the streets, hit, insulted, spat upon and forced to sing, "We have betrayed the German fatherland. We are responsible for the Paris assassination."

In a chapter titled Righteous Germans, Bard cites examples of German citizens who acted decently.

A coal merchant in Sontheim drove off thugs preparing to set the shul on fire and then escorted Jews out of town. Cardinal Michael von Faulhaber provided a truck for Munich's chief rabbi to save religious objects from the synagogue before it was destroyed. Max Schmelling, the former world heavyweight boxing champion, hid the two sons of a Jewish clothing store owner until it was safe for them to leave. And in the village of Warmsried, the local Catholic priest made sure that no actions were taken against Jews.

Unfortunately, these humanitarian acts were but a blip on the screen and had no effect whatsoever on the course of events.

In the wake of Kristallnacht, 120,000 German Jews and 140,000 Austrian Jews managed to emigrate. But tens of thousands of Jews were unable to leave, partially because western democracies refused to grant them entry visas.

For Jews who had no way out, life became increasingly miserable. Bard quotes one observer: "[Jews] were deprived of their occupations, robbed of their property, forbidden to inherit or bequeath, forbidden to sit on park benches, use public transportation, frequent restaurants, concerts, theatres and movie houses. They were stripped of all their civil rights, denied freedom of movement."

In a final and irrevocable step, the Nazis solved the "Jewish question" by deportations, starting in October 1941.

Fewer than 10,000 of the remaining 131,000 Jews in Germany targeted for extermination survived the war.

Kristallnacht paved the path to the destruction of one-third of European Jewry.

Jen Gould to perform at Beth Tikvah

By LAURA STRICKER
Special to The CJN

2008 Juno Award-winner Jen Gould is bringing her catchy, kid-friendly musical stylings to Beth Tikvah Synagogue on Nov. 9.

Gould started playing and writing music after the birth of her daughter, Shoshana. She wrote stories for Shoshana in rhyme and taught herself to play guitar.

Now, almost nine years later, her children's album Music Soup, which includes the songs Gina Meana and Monster in My Closet, has sold more than 20,000 copies.

Not only have her songs attracted the attention of children and parents all over the world, Gould is also a familiar face – and voice – both onstage and on the small screen.

During five seasons at the Stratford Festival, she took on such roles as Esmeralda in The Hunchback of Notre Dame and the title character in Gigi.

She is also a big fan of animated shows, lending her voice to Sailor Moon, Will and Dewitt, and Miss Spider, among others. Gould is currently working on a TV show of her own, for which she hopes to start production on by the end of the year.

Gould, who also has a son, credits having children of her own with inspiring her to write music.

"I was filled with joy and awe at having children," she said, adding that she would often write songs in one or two sittings.

"I love storytelling. [and] kids' music is engaging because it's storytelling."

This will be Gould's first concert at Beth Tikvah, to add to her roster of shows performed at the Green Toronto Festival and the Ottawa Children's Festival.

To purchase tickets for the 2 p.m. show, call 416-221-3433 ext. 354.

Gould's website address is www.jengouldmusic.com.

Comedian found his niche performing Jewish material

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Robert Cait always knew he wanted to be an entertainer. From a very young age, he would put on shows and write stories for friends and family.

Now living and working in Los Angeles, Toronto-born and raised Cait, a comedian, actor, screenwriter and voice-over artist, will be the featured performer and MC at Associated Hebrew School's 100th anniversary celebration on Nov. 6 at Beth Emeth Synagogue.

Cait is an alumnus of Associated, and he sang in the Beth Emeth Synagogue's boys' choir.

"Despite my comedic shtick about my education at the Associated, my three children attend Jewish day schools," Cait said by phone from Los Angeles, where he moved 16 years ago.

Cait also attended the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (now the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto), which he said he had to leave for medical reasons. "They were sick of me." He went on to explain that he was having trouble at school controlling his desire to go for laughs. "So in Grade 10, I was kicked out of CHAT."

He graduated from MacKenzie Collegiate Institute, where he achieved fame as one of the Blues Brothers in the school's musical revue. He went on to Ryerson University, where he studied radio and television arts, as well as theatre.

He joined Yuk Yuk's Komedy Kabaret, and, within a year, he was headlining at Yuk Yuk's. He said that after his first successful performance at Yuk Yuk's, he "came off the stage feeling the rush of strangers laughing at my thoughts."

Yuk Yuk's founder, Mark Breslin, encouraged Cait to continue performing and gave the young comedian some advice. "You have to learn to play to your audience," Breslin told him.

That, said Cait, has been with him ever since.

His first job was as the English commercial announcer for Multicultural Television CFMT (now OMNI Television). "They paid me $20 per spot, which was great," he said.

He then branched out into other areas, including working as a statistician and reporter for Hockey Night in Canada and as an announcer for professional wrestling.

Toronto-born comedian Robert Cait

He won the Bessie Craft Award for his voice work for Seagram's commercials.

Looking back, he said, "One of the beauties of living in Toronto was its multiculturalism. This allowed me to do a lot of character comedy with Italian, Portuguese and, of course, Yiddish accents, and I had a Hebrew and French day school education.

"My family, my education and my life in the Toronto Jewish community played a major part in developing my Jewish identity."

As he was building a successful voice career in Canada, he also began working in the United States. In 1992, an American agent sponsored him. He went to Los Angeles, where he continued his voice work and began working in comedy clubs on Sunset Strip.

Cait, who writes all his own material, says he became tired of the standup- comedy-club treadmill in Los Angeles. And he did not want to work on Shabbat.

He and his wife, a native of Los Angeles, were determined to build a traditional Jewish family. "Making Kiddush for my family on Friday night was infinitely more important than making strangers laugh.

"Over the years, I had written a wealth of Jewish material, but I had never performed any of it myself. A modern Orthodox synagogue in Los Angeles asked me to perform at their Purim Seudah. Suddenly, I found myself performing at countless synagogues and organizations," Cait said.

"Now I perform mostly in synagogues and for countless organizations for everything imaginable."

After performing at a major-donor cruise for Chabad, he was invited to become part of the Chabad network of some 3,600 communities worldwide.

"I have found my niche. More than that, I am giving other Jews a chance to get together and laugh and reconnect with their Judaism," he said. "I think I have created my own shleechus, my Judaic assignment and purpose."

Cait can relate to the wide spectrum of the Jewish world, from frum to the secular. He is funny yet tasteful, and not offensive.

Although he still does some voice-over work for commercials, cartoons and films, he said his greatest professional passion is his Jewish standup work. "It started in Toronto and, God willing, it is affecting a positive affirmation or return to Yiddishkeit around the world."

In March 2007, Associated invited Cait to Toronto to perform his Jewish standup routine at its Evening of Comedy at the Leah Posluns Theatre. He was a hit with the audience.

In December, Video Service Corporation will release a DVD titled Kosher Not Kosher. The DVD includes Cait's Jewish and non-Jewish performances. This, he said, is a reflection of the Toronto/Canadian scene.

"The Toronto Jewish community has played a major part in developing my strong Jewish identity. I still remain closely involved with his family and many friends in Toronto," he said.

EXHIBIT FOCUSES ON GERMANY'S DARK VISION

German academics and scientific researchers in 1941 created the General Plan for the East, the blueprint of the Nazi vision for eastern Europe that set out theoretical ways to expel culturally and racially "unacceptable" populations and replace them with German settlers.

"Science, Planning and Expulsion: The National Socialist General Plan for the East," an exhibition about the plan never before seen outside of Germany, is now on display at the Eric Arthur Gallery at the University of Toronto's John H. Daniels Faculty of Architecture, Landscape and Design, 230 College St. Until Dec. 13.

Koven trio serves up sweet jazz on new CD

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The Steve Koven Trio

Last month, local jazz artist and band leader Steve Koven released his seventh album.

The Sound of Songs is a prime example of why pianist-Hammond B3 organist Koven and bandmates Rob Clutton on bass and Anthony Michelli on drums have long been considered one of Canada's pre-eminent jazz groups.

On this latest release, the band is in its usual fine form, offering up nine, original sweet tunes composed by Koven.

The opening strains of the title track lead with a beautiful String Quartet arrangement by Clutton, before shifting into a swinging groove.

Track No. 2, Mr. Springer, is a more laid-back affair. It's built around a toe-tapping island vibe that will make you feel as if you should have a margarita in hand and a gentle Caribbean breeze at your back.

From that, the CD takes a turn to the reflective with Cameo, a sort of musical massage that evokes images of relaxing in a favourite lounge chair, a cup of hot chocolate in hand, while looking out the window on a cold winter's day.

Next up is Crawfish, think New Orleans dance shuffle with a bit of extra smoothness, thanks to special guest Kenny Kirkwood's saxophone stylings.

The trio then slide their way through the jaunty The Universe Loves Lily and Little Dance, the latter emphasizing some moody piano runs from Koven's deft fingers.

Koven and friends next get down and dirty on the self-explanatory Bungalow Blues. Kirkwood features once again, this time in a more fiery sax display throughout the arrangement.

On the eighth track, Honey-Do, the trio's back at it with some fun, free-flowing swing-Jazz.

As if laying a child to bed, Koven gently closes out the album with Faith's Dream, which, as the title suggests, is a dreamy, meditative affair that moves to a slow waltz-like rhythm.

The Sound of Songs was recorded at Inception Sound in Toronto in June and is out on the Bungalow Records and Steve Koven Music label.

For anyone with a taste for accessible, happy jazz, this is an album not to be missed and would make a terrific Chanukah gift.

Koven's website address is www.stevekoven.com.

Polished performance of Harold Arlen tunes

By TONY STURMAN
Special to The CJN

"Jewish entertainers are the meat and potatoes of the traditional nightclub." So says George Evans, and the artists he lined up for his latest cabaret series at Stadlers Polar Ice Lounge proves it.

Theresa Tova, Paula Wolfson, and Ilana Waldston performed at Evans' cabaret space this fall.

Waldston made an appearance on Oct. 18. She gave a compact, breezy performance of Harold Arlen tunes in a show she calls If I Only Had a Brain, after the song of the same name that Arlen wrote for The Wizard of Oz.

This was a departure from Waldston's last performance a few weeks earlier at the Danforth Jewish Circle. Unaware of her jazz vocal ability and repertoire, I had known only her capable backing of the choir at High Holiday services. A singer switching gears between Hebrew incantation and jazz? This story sounds familiar.

Harold Arlen

Dressed smartly in a sequined black jacket over black slacks, Waldston opened the set with the title song, backed by Mark Kieswetter on piano and Brendan Davis on bass. The song still resonates with her, she said, as she bantered about middle age, motherhood and memory lapses that lead to some "brainless" moments at this stage of her life.

She said that choosing an all-Arlen program gave her the opportunity to showcase both his well-known and lesser-known tunes. So she donned long, ruby-coloured satin gloves for a sultry delivery of A Woman's Prerogative, with excellent piano support from Kieswetter. Other tunes she performed included a softly rendered A Sleeping Bee, co-written with Truman Capote for the musical House of Flowers, and a soulful Blues in the Night.

While there was not much musical risk-taking by Waldston, her tight phrasing and fluid delivery contributed to a polished performance.

Evans said that when he met Waldston at Lisa Particelli's Girls Night Out, she was "funny, accessible, and her ease onstage struck me."

Waldston seemed at home sharing stories at Stadlers, an intimate venue. She proved very knowledgeable about her material and its composer.

Waldston's awareness of Arlen's musicality and the lyricists he collaborated with provided context for songs such as Down with Love and Paper Moon. The latter featured an excellent bass solo by Davis, and Waldston's light and jazzy delivery respected the sentimentality of the Yip Harburg lyric.

Evans' cabaret series at Stadlers, on Church Street in Toronto, runs through Dec. 20. Upcoming performers include Vincent Wolfe, as well as John Alcorn with Heather Bambrick. Check www.statlersonchurch.com for performance dates.

A film with an unusual perspective on the Holocaust

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Adapted from a children's novel by the Irish writer John Boyne, Mark Herman's The Boy in the Striped Pajamas offers a most unusual perspective on the Holocaust.

In this bracing British movie, which opens in Toronto on Nov. 7, the eve of the 70th anniversary of Kristallnacht, the Holocaust is seen through the eyes of Bruno (Asa Butterfield), a curious, guileless eight-year-old German boy.

Bruno's father (David Thewlis) is the commandant of a major concentration camp in Poland. He and his family live in a mansion near the high barbed wire fence that separates their house from the camp, yet only he knows what is going on in the camp.

Sworn to secrecy on his oath as an SS officer, he has told neither his wife, Elsa (Vera Farmiga), nor his children, Bruno and Gretel (Amber Beattie), about the real purpose of the camp. He falsely portrays it as a "farm" where "strangers" in striped uniforms work.

But as time elapses, the commandant drops some hints, claiming that the "strangers" are not really human beings, and that his duties, whatever they may be, are vital to Germany and the Nazi cause.

In the meantime, Bruno forms a forbidden friendship with Shmuel (Jack Scanlon), a Jewish boy on the other side of the fence, while the commandant's wife accidentally discovers, much to her shock and disgust, that mass murder is being committed in the camp.

A sense of dread permeates the film, and this is particularly true in one chilling scene when a junior SS officer informs Elsa that the source of black smoke in the sky is a crematoria.

A scene from The Boy in the Striped Pajamas

The revelation sets off an argument between Elsa and her fanatical Nazi husband. For Elsa, anti-Semitism is acceptable, but murder is beyond the pale.

Throughout all this, Bruno is buffeted by moral cross-currents. His older sister, a dyed-in-the wool Nazi sympathizer, tries to convince Bruno that Jews are "evil, dangerous vermin" who were responsible for Germany's defeat in World War I. But how, given his friendship with Shmuel, can he buy into this blatant lie?

The film, ably directed by Herman and featuring strong performances from Butterfield, Thewlis and Farmiga, is essentially a meditation on the brutality, senselessness and diabolical consequences of racial hatred.

Concluding with an extremely bizarre twist that is both ironic and redemptive, The Boy in the Striped Pajamas leaves an indelible impact.

Composers persecuted by Nazi Germany to be honoured in a concert

The classical music of four composers persecuted by Germany during the Nazi era will be showcased at a memorial concert at Toronto's Royal Conservatory of Music on Nov. 7 at 8 p.m. to mark the 70th anniversary of Kristallnacht.

Music in Exile: Emigre Composers of the 1930s will be presented by Artists of the Royal Conservatory, composed of faculty members of the Glenn Gould School of the Royal Conservatory of Music.

"The concert is part of our long-term commitment to explore music that has been lost through political turmoil and changes in musical fashion, specifically works by composers who were marginalized," said Simon Wynberg, the artistic director of Artists of the Royal Conservatory.

Adolf Busch

After Toronto, Music in Exile concerts will move to the Museum of Jewish Heritage in New York City (Nov. 9-13) and the Kennedy Center in Washington, D.C. (Nov. 18).

Wynberg said the Toronto concert is part of a series of concerts and lectures that began here two years ago and were repeated in London, Rome, Warsaw, Poznan and Budapest.

Five years ago, in collaboration with the Royal Ontario Museum, Artists of the Royal Conservatory staged Music Reborn, a string of concerts and lectures honouring composers murdered in Nazi concentration camps.

Robert Kahn

The Nov. 7 concert in Toronto will feature the Canadian premieres of Adolph Busch's Sextet for Strings, Robert Kahn's Suite for Violin and Piano, Op. 69, Matyas Seiber's Divertimento for Clarinet and String Quartet and Sandor Vandor's Air for cello and piano.

"Sieber, Kahn and Vandor were all Jews," said Wynberg. "Busch was the pre-eminent German violinist of his day, but his embarrassment and sense of shame at Hitler's accession to power meant that his career came to an abrupt stop in 1933."

Busch (1891-1952) settled in Switzerland and then the United States after fleeing Germany. Along with Rudolf Serkin, he was one of the founders of the Marlboro Music School and Festival. Among his students was Yehudi Menuhin.

"Busch's huge output of music is certainly worth exploring, and his String Sextet is a particularly fine example of his huge creative abilities," said Wynberg.

Sieber (1905-1960), Hungarian-born, studied in Budapest with Zoltan Kodaly. "Sieber was a highly influential teacher," Wynberg said.

Kahn (1865-1951) befriended Johannes Brahms and was a member of the Prussian Academy of Arts. "His chamber music, while very much in the tradition of Brahms, has nevertheless a striking individual charm," explained Wynberg.

Vandor, who was killed by the Nazis in 1945, was a conductor and choir director.

"The contributions that these composers made to classical music are yet to be fully judged, as until recently their works were largely ignored because their conservative style ran counter to post-war trends," said Wynberg.

Two hoops-playing teens make long shot to Israel

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Teenagers Gilad Carroll and Kevin Oman, who began playing basketball as young children, never would have imagined that their passion for the game would be the catalyst for their first trip to Israel.

Carroll and Oman are thrilled to have been selected to the Canadian youth boys basketball team for the Maccabiah Games, which take place July 12 to 23, 2009, in the Holy Land.

"I didn't even know that the Maccabiah games existed until this year," said Carroll, 16. "My dad is the one who suggested I try out for the games. He saw an advertisement somewhere about the Olympics and he started to think about the 'Jewish Olympics.' He looked it up on the Internet. When he told me about the games, I decided right away to try out. I was excited."

Oman, 17, also didn't know about the games.

"It's going to be cool. I've always wanted to go to Israel. To go for basketball is real sweet," he said.

The Canadian team will play its games at the Wingate Institute, which is just outside the city of Netanya and overlooks the Mediterranean Sea and the Poleg Nature Reserve.

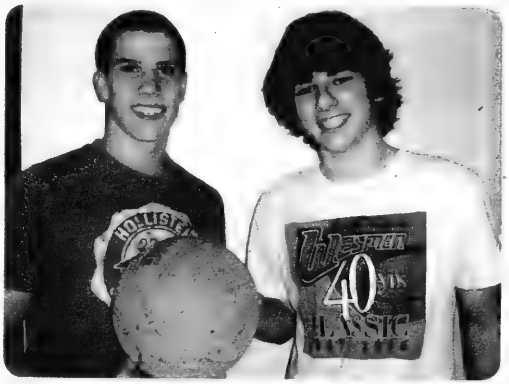
The two teens flew to Toronto in May to try out for the team and were partially reimbursed for their flight by Maccabi Canada.

"Aside from the two of us, everyone on the team is from Toronto and Montreal. We don't know any of them," said Carroll, a six-foot guard.

"We're flying back to Toronto on Dec. 26 for a few days to practise with the team. We'll also practise again with the team in Toronto a few days before we leave for Israel in the summer," Oman said. He and Carroll will be staying with cousins when in Toronto.

Carroll, who describes himself as "the first athlete ever on my dad's side of the family," is currently a guard for the University of Winnipeg's Junior Wesmen team, as well as the Grant Park Collegiate's Pirates.

"I play basketball about four or five times a week," he said.



Kevin Oman, left, and Gilad Carroll will play on Maccabi Canada's under-19 youth team in Israel next summer. [Rhonda Spivak photo]

Carroll attributes his basketball skills to "my mom's side of the family. My mom used to play basketball on the University of Manitoba team. She's going to come to Israel to watch me play."

Oman said Carroll's special skill is his outside shot. "He [Carroll] will hit any three-point shot."

Oman, who is also six feet tall, plays guard on the Junior Wesmen team and has been playing basketball "since I was nine years old." No one else in his family "is into basketball," he said.

"Kevin's special skill is that he always gets to the basket very easily. He can plow through the other team's defence," said Carroll, who has been friends with Oman for years.

Ted Badner, head coach of Maccabi Canada's Under-19 youth team, said both boys will be expected to contribute to what will have to be a team effort if Canada is to win a medal at next summer's competition.

At the 2005 Maccabiah, Canada won a bronze medal after posting a 6-1 record. That team was led by three elite players who went on to play varsity college basketball – one of them at an NCAA Division 1 school.

"This team is different… This team does not have the same top-end talent, but it's deeper. We'll rely on more kids to contribute," Badner said. "Gilad can shoot from outside, Kevin is extremely athletic and can take the ball to the basket."

Badner said both players turned heads at the tryouts, which took place over three days.

"I kind of knew most of the talent. I never heard of either of them. I was quite impressed and surprised when we saw them. We expect them to contribute," Badner said.

Sharon Chisvin, Carroll's mother, said, "We are very proud of and excited for Gilad, both for the opportunity to play at such a high level and for the opportunity to play in Israel. We're hoping that this experience will instil in him a lifelong love for Israel, its vitality and its people."

Carroll said he's looking forward to playing against the host team. "Apparently, the Israeli team plays really aggressively. That's what our coach [in Toronto] says."

"There are some really good players [from the east] on the Canadian team, and we all are practising. I think we should be pretty good in Israel," Oman said.

Oman hopes to travel in Israel after the Games are over. "I'm not sure who from my family is going to come to Israel to see the Games. We're still deciding."

"We anticipate playing one game a day while we are in Israel, and for the rest of the time there will be organized tours for us of the country. I think we'll be staying at a kibbutz hotel," Carroll said.

Carroll is also hoping to experience Israel's sizzling night life.

"After all, we have to fuel the economy," he said.

Using talent for a good cause

This past month, I had a brush with 15 minutes of fame – not my own mind you, but with the fame of two people who handled themselves very differently in the spotlight.

The first incident involved an actor friend of mine who invited me to the premiere of a film. Not exactly being the Hollywood glam type, I just considered myself lucky to be seeing a movie a couple days before it opened.

But I quickly realized what I was in for when my friend called me three times for advice on what to wear.

Nonetheless, nothing could have prepared me for the temper tantrum he threw when he realized he had missed the red carpet.

"This was a chance for me to get my picture in the paper," he said, pouting.

I tried to be sympathetic, but when he said, "If I don't get to see the movie in the VIP room with the talent, I'm out of here," I couldn't help but laugh.

Maybe that was mean of me, but maybe sometimes people need to be shamed into seeing the truth.

Which brings me to another talented friend of mine.

Billie Mintz has every reason to be a diva, and yet he's not. He's an award-winning filmmaker who, most recently, was named Entrepreneur of the Year by Enterprise Toronto.

Despite his success, Billie insists that any and all attention be focused on his cause, called Artists Raising Consciousness. It's both a notion he believes in and the name of his business.

As a natural storyteller, Billie has tried to highlight the challenges that people face. His stories have always been touching and unique. I'll never forget his tale of an imaginary friend who became depressed when he realized the boy who made him up was outgrowing him. Or the sensitivity he showed when telling the story of a young boy who was shunned by his classmates after receiving chemotherapy.

Now, he's focused his talents on corporations and the responsibility they have to society.

One of Billie's most recent projects was partly inspired by his cousin, Cory Mintz, who died this past summer in a car accident in Muskoka. The project is titled Message in a Bottle, and it's being undertaken in partnership with Molson.

It's a mini-series about responsible choices, and it will pose important questions about the roles that the community and corporations have in ensuring young people get the right message about alcohol.

Billie could be using his enormous talent to catch the attention of Hollywood agents. Instead, he has chosen to focus on getting the attention of regular people in the hope of awakening their own sense of social responsibility.

When I asked Billie whether he would mind if I wrote about him, he said that he would, in fact, mind. He's always quick to remind me that it's about the cause and not the person.

But there's a quote that comes to mind from another formidable entrepreneur and philanthropist. Seymour Schulich once said, "If you say you are great, you're a braggart, a bore or someone that people will flee from. If someone else says you are great, people pay attention and are at least intrigued by the possibility."

So here I am, Billie, pointing out the greatness in what you are doing – and doing my part to raise consciousness about your efforts to use your talent to make the world a better place, and hoping others will be inspired to do the same.

A Family Business for over 60 Years

Dear Ella,

I'm not sure why I am writing this. Perhaps it is cathartic for me.

Last week, I lost my best friend, my dog, Sam. He had been with me since he was 8 weeks old. Sam introduced me to my husband. We were walking in the park when Alan approached to pet him. Sam was there to help me raise my two boys. He never left my side through illnesses and rough times, and he was with us to share our happy times, too. His passing is a huge loss to our family.

I have taken time off work to grieve the loss of my dear friend, but I'm not getting much support. I have already had two calls from co-workers who just don't understand why I need this time. "It's too busy for you to just take off" is what one of them said to me.

I am literally afraid to go back. I know that I'm being talked about, and I know I will not get any support or understanding when I return. Do you have any ideas about how to handle this?

Goodbye Dear Friend

Dear Goodbye Dear Friend

I am very sorry for your loss. Sam was a family member in every sense, but you can't make someone who is not a "pet person" understand this. Until you have had the good fortune of experiencing the unconditional love, the warmth and happiness that a nuzzle or purr can create, and the serenity that patting your pet can have, you can't relate to the loss of such a friendship. Losing a family pet requires grieving, and you are taking that time. It's not an indulgence, as your colleagues may think. It's a necessity.

When you get back to work, don't expect sympathy and support. Just get through the day and lose yourself in your work. Each day will become easier as you eventually fall back into your routine. Do not be angry with your co-workers. Remember: not everyone is as fortunate as you to be able to know the true emotional gift that a pet can provide.

We can all take a lesson from our furry friends. They don't judge us, they never hold a grudge and they just love us unconditionally. People who have never had pets will never experience this.

Hang on to the memories that Sam left you. They will always comfort you and make you smile when you need them.

Sharpening your intuition

Recently, during an on-camera audition for the W Network's Expert Search, I talked about how often I encourage my clients to follow their intuition and how I am more aware than ever that intuition is an incredible source of information that can supersede logic, facts and reason.

But intuition and gut feelings often get a bad rap, and indeed many scientists dismiss intuition as being too "woo woo" and just not reliable. And yet every great discovery, including the theory of relativity, and Einstein's major contributions to quantum physics, both came from the fact that he was an intuitive genius. Einstein had an inner vision, or intuition, about what was and was not a good fundamental theory. Intuition and imagination played major roles in his remarkable discoveries. So don't discount this powerful resource of information, as it can be a huge key to your success in your relationships, your career and your life. I guess the real question is, how do we tell the difference between a feeling or hunch that is accurate and reliable and one that isn't?

A fascinating article in Psychology Today, called Gut Almighty (in the May/June 2007 issue) makes the case for trusting intuition. Carlin Flora wrote that there are times when trusting your gut is the smartest move and times when you really should think twice.

"Intuitions or gut feelings are sudden, strong judgments whose origin we can't immediately explain. Although they seem to emerge from an obscure inner force, they actually begin with a perception of something outside, a facial expression, a tone of voice, a visual inconsistency so fleeting, you aren't even aware you noticed," she said.

The best explanation psychologists now offer for this is that intuition is a "mental matching game." So the brain absorbs and takes in a situation, and searches through its files and finds the thing that is similar in all of its stored memories and knowledge. This all happens in a matter of seconds, and even though there may be no logic or reason, you just know something. That is intuition at play, and when you listen to it, it can be a very powerful resource.

You know the feeling of butterflies in your stomach when you are auditioning for something or at a job interview, or meeting someone that you really like. Well, according to cognitive scientist Alexandre Linhares of the Brazilian School of Business, "that visceral punch in the paunch is testament that emotions are an intrinsic part of all gut feelings." So the theory is that "if you witness something while your adrenaline is pumping, it will be remembered very vividly. He said, "Intuition can be described as almost immediate situation understanding as opposed to immediate knowledge. Understanding is filled with emotion. We don't obtain knowledge of love, danger or joy – we feel them in a meaningful way."

The best part of intuition is that it at least compels us to act in specific ways and make a move. It can be used as the first step in solving a problem or deciding what to do. Also, the more you sharpen the skill, the more reliable your intuition become. Having said that, it is best to test out your hunches, as you can easily latch onto the wrong detail and pull up the wrong web of associations in your brain.

Fine-tuning your intuition will help you make better decisions. Here are some tips on how to get started.

Turn the sound off of a movie and try to imagine what the dialogue is or guess what the person in front of you at the line at Starbucks is going to order. Then test your hunches by turning the sound of the movie on or listening to which coffee the person actually ordered.

What it comes down to, is when we are agonizing over a decision and we are struggling with too much information or too many choices, sometimes we ought to go with our first best instinct or feeling. So the next time you're really stuck, tune in to your intuition. I have a hunch it might just work for you!

Six Jewish war vets join in commemoration

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Only six Jewish war veterans marched in the ceremony to open the commemoration of the 70th anniversary of Kristallnacht. Their dwindling numbers is a stark reminder of the message echoed throughout the evening: as time passes, there are fewer and fewer people to tell the story.

More than 400 people gathered in the West Block of Parliament Hill on Nov. 9, 70 years after the "Night of Broken Glass," when Hitler's followers burned, vandalized and looted Jewish businesses, synagogues, cemeteries and schools. On that night, nearly 100 Jews were murdered and hundreds more were injured.

Among those gathered to remember, pay tribute to and show solidarity with the Jewish community around the world were ambassadors and representatives from a number of embassies including those of Israel, Sweden, Germany, Austria, Lithuania, the Czech Republic, Hungary, Ukraine, Turkey, Switzerland, the Netherlands and the Papal Nunzia.

"What we are here to do tonight is to recall history and to make sure we don't forget history," said Ottawa Centre MP Paul Dewar, in introducing keynote speaker David Kilgour.

Kilgour, a human rights activist and former Liberal member of Parliament, said that although there were exceptions, many Christians in Europe stood by and allowed the tragedy to happen, doing "too little to honour the second commandment of Jesus, to 'love your neighbour as yourself.'

How will Obama affect Israel?

By LESLIE SUSSER
JTA

Barack Obama's election as America's first black president has left Israeli decision makers deeply impressed, somewhat envious of the workings of American democracy and, in some corners, worried about possible new U.S. policy directions.

With Israel in the throes of an election campaign of its own, pundits are also asking how America's choice of Obama for president could affect voters here come next February, when Israel will hold general elections for Knesset and prime minister.

Analysis

The big Israeli foreign policy concern is that Obama, who says he favours negotiations with Iran, might begin talks with Iranian leaders without preconditions. Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni says this would be interpreted as a sign of weakness and send Tehran the wrong message that it can build a nuclear weapon with impunity.

The Israeli fear is that if there are no preconditions, Tehran simply will use talks with the United States as a smokescreen to continue its nuclear weapons' drive unhindered. The Israeli government believes no talks should be launched unless the Iranians agree to a verifiable suspension of their uranium enrichment program. At the very least, that would ensure that the talks delay Iran's nuclear plans.

After intensive policy planning sessions on the implications of Obama's victory, the Foreign Ministry decided last Wednesday to send seasoned Israeli diplomats to Washington to urge members of the president-elect's close circle to insist on the uranium suspension precondition and to tighten sanctions against Iran if it balks.

The Israelis are confident this effort could bear fruit. They point out that, like them, Obama is determined to prevent Iran from going nuclear; any differences they may have are over tactics alone.

'Three-peat' for Gray

WINNIPEG — For the third straight year, a teacher at Gray Academy of Jewish Education – Winnipeg's main kindergarten to Grade 12 Jewish day school – has won a Grinspoon-Steinhardt Award for Excellence in Jewish Education. Grade 5 and 6 Judaic studies teacher Shery Wolfe-Elazar received the prize, given out since 2000 by the U.S.-based Jewish Education Service of North America and sponsored by the Grinspoon Foundation and the Jewish Life Network/Steinhardt Foundation. Gray teachers Rochelle Gamliel and Joyce Kerr also won in 2006, while Anat Ekhoiz and Carol Leszcz won in 2007.

Franken in Recount

MINNEAPOLIS — The U.S. Senate race in Minnesota between Republican incumbent Norm Coleman and comedian Al Franken is headed for a recount. Franken, a former Saturday Night Live cast member, said he'll seek a recount under state laws requiring them in close elections, citing statewide reports of voting problems. Out of three million votes cast, Coleman declared victory with a 708-vote lead in the final tally. The candidates, both Jewish, fought a bitter campaign, with Franken, a Democrat, accusing Coleman of corruption.

Blind Rabbi Loses

NEW YORK — A blind rabbi lost his race for U.S. Congress. Rabbi Dennis Shulman, a Democrat, was defeated by three-term incumbent Rep. Scott Garrett in New Jersey's 5th Congressional District by a 56-42 per cent margin. The Reform rabbi, who received national attention for his unique personal story, called Garrett "too conservative" for the district and accused the Republican of taking an improper tax break and being too close to a mortgage company linked to the economic crisis. Garrett denied any wrongdoing.

Gay Jew Wins

DENVER — A Jewish man made history as the first openly gay non-incumbent male elected to the U.S. Congress. Jared Polis, 33, will represent Colorado's heavily Democratic 2nd Congressional District, which includes Boulder and other Denver suburbs. Polis is a multimillionaire web entrepreneur who founded an Internet site for his parents' greeting card company and donated more than $5 million to his campaign.

A Jewish Trump?

NEW YORK — Ivanka Trump has begun converting to Judaism. The daughter of real estate tycoon Donald Trump started the process at Kehilath Jeshurun, an Orthodox synagogue on Manhattan's East Side, Ynetnews reported. Trump, 27, is engaged to Jewish businessman Jared Kushner. The former model is vice-president of her father's firm. The couple will wed next year.

Watchdog Criticizes Radio-Canada

MONTREAL — The pro-Israel media watchdog Honest Reporting Canada protested Radio-Canada's airing of what it calls a "pro-Palestinian advocacy film."

The film Peace, Propaganda and the Promised Land: U.S. Media and the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict, made by the U.S.-based Media Education Foundation, a left-leaning documentary producer based in Northhampton, Mass., was broadcast Oct. 23 on CBC's French network.

"By airing a film rife with false premises, serious omissions and unfounded malicious allegations, the network not only misinformed Canadians about the politics and history of the Middle East, it also breached its own journalistic standards and practices by airing a one-sided partisan polemic bent on vilifying a fellow democracy, the State of Israel," said Honest Reporting director Mike Fegelman.

Radio-Canada assistant ombudsman Laure Simonet in a letter said the complaint has been forwarded to Luce Julien, senior director of news and current affairs, who was responsible for the programming.

Arrests in Van Attack

BERLIN — Berlin police have arrested two teens in connection with a Nov. 1 attack on a van carrying a Chabad rabbi and eight rabbinical students. The suspects, 16- and 18-year-old males, confessed to the crime, according to news reports. Both come from families that immigrated to Germany, and at least one has roots in Lebanon.

Jewish organization loses charitable status

Choson Kallah no longer able to issue donation receipts

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Canada Revenue Agency (CRA) has stripped a Jewish organization of its charitable status after finding its primary purpose was to serve as part of a tax-avoidance scheme.

In a letter to the Choson Kallah Fund of Toronto, Terry de March, director general of the CRA's charities directorate, stated that the organization's charitable status will be revoked, preventing it from issuing official donation receipts. Choson Kallah is no longer exempt from paying tax, unless it qualifies as a non-profit organization, and it may be taxed on its remaining assets, CRA stated.

"It remains our view that the charity has willingly lent its name and tax-receipting privileges to the tax shelter in exchange for monetary compensation. In our view, the charity has participated in a program designed to abuse the charitable gifts incentive provisions of the Income Tax Act," stated a CRA document outlining the reasons behind the revocation.

"Between 2004 and 2005, the charity issued receipts in excess of $177 million, or 90 per cent of the charity's total income, for donations of pharmaceuticals earmarked for international programs… In 2006 alone… the charity issued receipts totalling over $131 million," far above the charity's previous average of between $4 million to $6 million per year, the CRA said.

In receiving the pharmaceuticals and issuing tax receipts "the charity was merely operating as the receipting agent in this arrangement – issuing receipts for property it did not see, need or want and passing this property to a third-party organization,"the CRA said.

In exchange, Choson Kallah received a little more than one per cent of the value receipted, from which it paid a fee to an administrator, the letter stated. The charity did not attempt to independently verify the values of the donations for which it issued receipts, the agency said.

The CRA noted the charity netted only .05 per cent of the value of the donation receipts after expenses, and it failed to maintain the documentation necessary to prove recipients of allocated funds met the definition of charity required by law. Some recipients were not suffering poverty, but received money for wedding assistance, fertility treatments and to pay private debts.

Rabbi Eli Gross, president of Choson Kallah Fund, said the decision will be appealed.

"Right now, I don't think I will be able to continue our good works," Rabbi Gross is quoted as telling the Toronto Star. "I don't know the mechanics of the tax fund, the legality of it or how it works."

He told the Star that Choson Kallah has been operating for more than 20 years. It started as a small operation that helped people get married, but grew to provide $4 million in poverty relief, mostly to Israel.

Choson Kallah did not return calls from The CJN.

The CRA stated it is "reviewing all tax shelter-related donation arrangements (for example, schemes that typically promise donors tax receipts worth more than the actual amount of the donation)" and it "plans to audit every participating charity, promoter and investor."

In the past few months, the International Charity Association Network and the Banyan Tree Foundation were stripped of their charitable status. Last week, the CRA stated in a news release it had "revoked the status of the Canadian Amateur Football Association as a registered Canadian amateur athletic association," with the power to issue tax receipts for gifts or donations.

A very impressive achievement

From the editor's desk

The bad news about the economy – about markets, banks, investors, stockbrokers, pension funds, industry, manufacturers, mortgagors, mortgagees, shopkeepers, workers and homeowners – has commanded our attention for nearly two months.

It has covered the land like a carpet of deep snow.

Wherever we walked, we stepped in it, unable to avoid it, wherever we turned.

Nerves have been severely frayed as legitimate worries over jobs and personal, family futures mounted with each new bulletin about stock market volatility and and business closures.

Against this avalanche of bad economic news, we hardly noticed during the same period the rising in downtown Toronto of a new shining star in the sparkling cultural firmament of Canada.

The Art Gallery of Ontario (AGO), newly transformed, renovated and rebuilt, opened its doors this week to the public. Like most stars of high luminescence, it has substantial gravity. Over the years, it is easy to predict, it will exert a profound gravitational pull, attracting into its substantial aura a large public following and new generations of artists.

In transforming itself, it will also have transformed the community in which it resides, as well as the far wider community of artists and gallery-goers around the world.

Many people have been involved in the transformation of the AGO and deserve recognition and thanks for their involvement. But the individual who has been the compass steering the project through all its complexities from inception to completion is Matthew Teitelbaum, the gallery's director and CEO.

The CJN recently met with Teitelbaum at this office to talk about the "new" gallery. His calm, gentle manner could not hide his excitement at the opening that was imminent.

"Our purpose was to create a great home for art. That was our clarifying and simplifying mantra," Teitelbaum told me in reference to the way he set about gathering and fusing the many diverse elements he would need to achieve the goal.

In our discussion, he emphasized this very point again and again.

"We are determined to build a great home for art where people are going to have a great and unique experience."

He never doubted that they would succeed because, as he explained in considerable detail, "we all worked together."

It was very important to Teitelbaum from the very start of the massive undertaking to instil a sense among his staff that the project belonged to all of them.

Matthew Teitelbaum

His use of the word "together" was not merely a motivational mantra but a project prescription.

"Everyone had to feel that they had a piece of the project," he said. "At the outset I told our staff that the project is like a flying a big plane. It will require hard work. There will be turbulence. But we must be focused on the destination and we will get there.

"We were not thrown off by skeptics, by the challenges. There were indeed ups and downs, questions and challenges, but we worked together and met the challenges."

Teitelbaum has an easy and elegant bearing. He is quick with a smile and a casual reflection. Apart from Frank Gehry, the renowned architect, whose design has created both a new home for the gallery's art and a new way of experiencing that art, Teitelbaum probably knew more about the project and its many component parts than anyone else.

But in describing his role in the overall project, he used the metaphor of a hub at the centre of a number of busy, important spokes of delegation, implementation and responsibility. "But I was never the hub alone," he added modestly, making sure to add that he worked with a team of advisers. He was also a "spoke" himself in relation to substantive art issues regarding acquisition and display of pieces.

When asked what in his past training and experience may have helped prepare him for the task of overseeing so large and so important a project, Teitelbaum responded again modestly, but revealingly. "My parents taught me to observe and to learn about human behaviour, my mentors taught me about the importance of process and Ken Thomson taught me about disciplined thinking."

True to his generosity toward others, Teitelbaum took pains to share the credit for the very impressive achievement that is now the new and transformed Art Gallery of Ontario. He has created a culture of inclusion at the gallery that applies to every individual who was involved in the remaking of the gallery.

That sense of inclusion, Teitelbaum promised, will also apply to the experience of the visiting public at the new gallery, where the ethereal, illuminating quality of bright natural light will be directed into new spaces and high arching vaults by Gehry's genius.

"We did good things here," Teitelbaum proudly concluded.

The public can now see and be moved by those good things for themselves.

TERROR LEGITIMIZED AT THE UN

On Nov. 13, 1974, with a pistol strapped to his belt, Yasser Arafat, chairman of the Palestine Liberation Organization addressed the United Nations General Assembly in New York for the first time. The champion of terror and terrorism against Israel, Israelis and Jewish targets around the world, Arafat was nevertheless welcomed to the august chamber by the majority of member countries. Despite his tactics, he became the symbol of the Palestinian cause.

Israeli analyst voices concerns about Obama

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

U.S. president-elect Barack Obama may be too anxious to resolve the Palestinian problem and not sufficiently eager to stop Iran from acquiring a nuclear arsenal, an Israeli analyst warned last week.

Yossi Klein Halevi, a senior fellow affiliated with the right-wing Shalem Center in Jerusalem and the Israel correspondent for the New Republic, made these observations at Holy Blossom Temple in delivering the second Gerald Schwartz and Heather Reisman lecture of the season.

Saying he was playing the role of an "Israeli curmudgeon," Klein Halevi voiced three concerns about Obama's possible reaction to three issues of crucial importance to Israel:

- How will he relate to the growing delegitimization of Israel?
- How will he deal with the Palestinian question?
- How will he respond to Iran's quest for nuclear arms?

To allay fears that Israel's existence is expendable, Klein Halevi said, Obama should, as soon as possible, express support for Israel and strengthen the United States' relationship with it.

As well, Obama should say that Israelis are "an indigenous people" who have come home" and are not colonial interlopers who have pushed Palestinians off their land.

On the Palestinian issue, he urged Obama, whom he described as "the most untested" American leader in years, to understand why there is still no peace between Israel and the Palestinians after 15 years of on-again, off-again negotiations.

Blaming the Palestinian side for the impasse, Klein Halevi said Palestinians have yet to accept the intrinsic right of the Jewish people to define themselves as a sovereign nation in Israel.

He charged that Palestinian leaders are using the contentious issue of the "right of return" to undermine Israel's Jewish character and destroy the Jewish state.

He added that the Palestinians have yet to waive their demand that Palestinian refugee should be permitted to return to their former homes in what is now Israel.

Unless the Palestinians give up this demand, there will be no peace, Klein Halevi said.

By the same token, he said in a reference to Israel's settlements beyond the old Green Line, Israeli Jews must realize that they can't fully exercise their right of return to the West Bank.

Yossi Klein Halevi

Klein Halevi voiced concern that the Obama administration may exert pressure on Israel to show flexibility by accepting the principle of the right of return in exchange for a Palestinian agreement to drop their demand for a right of return to Israel.

If Israel accepts this principle, he predicted, the international community will press Israel to admit Palestinian refugees under family reunification programs.

Klein Halevi, an American who made aliyah in 1982, said he would only come to terms with this principle if the Palestinians permit Jews to settle in the West Bank.

At present, he noted, the Palestinians reject the right of Jews to live in Hebron, a biblically historic town in the West Bank inhabited by Arabs and a small Jewish community.

Klein Halevi expressed the hope that Obama will inform the Palestinians that no responsible Israeli government will ever embrace the Palestinian right of return. "It's a non-starter."

The real issue today is Israel's legitimacy rather than settlements or final borders, he said.

Israel is ready to make peace with the Palestinians, he added, citing its "credible offer" of territorial concessions at the Camp David summit in the summer of 2000.

Turning to Iran, Klein Halevi said he is "profoundly anxious" about the possibility that Obama will launch lengthy talks with the Iranian government as it continues to develop its nuclear capability.

Suggesting that diplomacy has already run its course, he called on the United States and the international community to immediately impose "serious sanctions" on Iran before it develops an atomic bomb.

Citing Israeli intelligence reports, Klein Halevi said Iran will possess such weapons within 18 months.

A nuclear-armed Iran will have a chilling effect on Israel, prompting many Israelis to emigrate, he added.

If Israel allows Iran to become a nuclear power, Zionism will have failed. "It will mean we didn't have what it takes to protect Israel," Klein Halevi said.

Israel, however, has the military means to strike Iranian nuclear sites. He strongly suggested that Israel's armed forces will act alone, if necessary, to disable Iran's nuclear infrastructure.

A new American president

The bold newspaper headlines captured the spirit of the day: Obama, Obama overcomes, A Dream fulfilled. Some 145 years after President Abraham Lincoln issued the Emancipation Proclamation freeing slaves, and 44 years after President Lyndon Johnson signed the Civil Rights Act annulling Jim Crow segregationist laws, Barack Hussein Obama, a first-term U.S. senator from Illinois, defied the weight of history and was elected the first African-American president of the United States, beating his honourable but ineffectual Republican opponent, John McCain, by a commanding margin.

Barack Obama

Obama's astonishing ascendancy to the White House closes a dark chapter in American race relations, during which the democratic rights of its downtrodden black population were all too often denied. African-Americans were subjected to oppressive and humiliating restrictions and conventions, even after the seminal Civil War. Jim Crow laws – which segregated public facilities, relegated African-Americans to second-class citizenship and made a mockery of American ideals – crushed their dignity and aspirations. It took decades of civil rights protests, impassioned speeches and judicial interventions to correct glaring injustices that condemned millions of law-abiding American citizens to hostility, ostracism, violence, dashed hopes and virtual servitude.

When Obama, a 47-year-old Harvard University graduate, launched his brilliant campaign to be the Democratic party's presidential nominee, few observers gave him any chance of winning. Apart from his biracial ancestry, he had a foreign-sounding name and was burdened by the maliciously false rumour that he was secretly a Muslim. Obama, a Christian, took these slurs in stride as he defeated the superbly capable front-runner, Hillary Clinton, the junior senator from New York. As he crisscrossed the country, he pledged a fundamental change in direction, bringing his "Yes we can" message of hope to an increasingly multicultural nation scarred by the spectre of Islamic fundamentalist terrorism, shaken by an economic crisis and mired in protracted wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. The outcome of last week's election is not only a historic triumph for Obama and a repudiation of President George W. Bush's generally dismal record, but equally a resounding victory for minority rights and a transformative event.

Obama, whose inexorable march to the White House was supported by seven out of 10 American Jews, inherits a mound of problems and confronts a panoply of challenges as he readies himself fore the world's most important job. The U.S. economy is faltering. Americans are in dire need of a national health care plan. Wars in distant lands have strained America's credibility and sapped its coffers. Washington's relationship with a resurgent Russia is unravelling. China beckons as a superpower. The Arab-Israeli conflict still simmers. Iran – a destabilizing influence in the Middle East and Israel's archenemy – is racing toward acquiring a nuclear arsenal. Obama, a cool, level-headed man of integrity, clearly has his work cut out for him. Let us hope he succeeds. In the meantime, we hail his successful run for the presidency as an encouraging and seismic turning point in American democracy.

Falash Mora immigration not cut off

In "Joint's doctor provides non-sectarian care in Ethiopia" (CJN, Nov. 6), you state that Israel has cut off the Falash Mora immigration. The opposite is true. The Prime Minister's Office decided in September to check up to another 3,000 Falash Mora for eligibility for aliyah and will be bringing people at a rate of 100 a month to Israel. In addition, there are two bills in the Knesset that have already passed preliminary readings (with votes of 44-1 and 43-1 in favour) asking to check the remaining 8,700 for eligibility for aliyah.

In addition, the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (the Joint) is only providing emergency care, which has to fall within certain emergency guidelines, to the Falash Mora. That is the reason that only 284 people from the 8,700-strong Falash Mora community have received care from the Joint to date. This care does not include immunizations against deadly diseases or any preventive care.

The North American Conference on Ethiopian Jewry is the only organization providing food and education to the Falash Mora community.

It is important to realize that any misinformation on the issue affects funding for the Falash Mora currently in Ethiopia, which affects the food and services the community receives, as well as advocacy efforts on the community's behalf. It is important to be extremely careful to get all the facts.

Anti-NDP bias

Your anti-New Democratic Party bias in Canadian politics is reflected in your wrap-up of the recent federal election. ("Tories shut out of 416 but make inroads with Jewish voters," CJN, Oct. 23).

In one Montreal riding with a large Jewish community, Outremont, all you note is the small turnout in the advance polls. From this, you surmise that the large chassidic community didn't bother to vote. Even if this is so, this means they didn't feel the need to vote against Thomas Mulcair, the first New Democrat to win in Quebec in a federal general election.

Furthermore, you neglected to cover the results in my riding of Trinity-Spadina in Toronto, which is also the home of the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre. Here, incumbent New Democrat Olivia Chow won re-election over the Liberal party's Christine Innes, with the Conservative Party of Canada coming in a distinct third.

By such omission you distort the truth. There is strong support for all major parties in the Canadian Jewish community. That includes the NDP.

Memorials for Jewish war veterans

In "A unique monument to Canadian Jewish war veterans" (CJN Perspectives, Nov. 6), Barbara Weiser neglected to mention the memorial at Mount Sinai Memorial Park Cemetery in Toronto, which is designed in the form of an artillery shell. There are also some beautiful glass windows honouring our veterans in the Sunnybrook Jewish Chapel at the Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre in Toronto. They are one of a kind.

Prisoner exchanges

I am disappointed with the way the Israeli government has conducted recent prisoner exchanges with Hezbollah and with the Palestinian Authoritys. Israel recently received the bodies of two dead Israeli soldiers and released hundreds of Hezbollah terrorists, including one notorious murderer serving a life sentence. I realize Israel is committed to the principle of not leaving any of its soldiers behind, but I wonder if it was known that the soldiers were dead, which was never revealed by the Red Cross or anyone else, whether the Israelis would have been so generous in the numbers released.

With the release of 198 Palestinian prisoners, some of whom were guilty of killing Israelis, Israel only boosted the popularity of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas. Israel should have insisted on receiving Gilad Schalit, who was abducted by Hamas, in exchange.

We got the date wrong

The caption with the photo on the front page of the Nov. 6 CJN says that Miriam Ziv, Israel's new ambassador to Canada, presented her credentials to Gov. Gen. Michaelle Jean "last week."

That struck me as odd since I knew that Ziv has been in Canada since early September. I went on the Israeli Embassy website and found the same picture there dating the event to Sept. 15.

You're off by about 6 weeks there.

American Jewish voters embrace Obama

By RON KAMPEAS
JTA

WASHINGTON — For some Jewish voters, the strangeness of Barack Obama was like a recurring dream: unsettling and then settling in, and then, suddenly, revelatory.

Ari Wallach described breaking through to elderly Jews in Florida who had resisted voting for the son of the man from Kenya, the tall black man with the middle name Hussein.

"It wasn't only his policy on Israel and Iran, on health care," said Wallach, whose Jewsvote.org led the "Great Shlep," an effort to prod young adults to get their Jewish grandparents in Florida to vote for Obama. "His biography feels so Jewish, it feels like an Ellis Island archetype. People felt more comfortable when I talked about where he came from, it resonated so deeply – surprisingly among older Jews."

For months, polls showed Obama languishing at about 60 per cent of the Jewish vote, a critical chunk short of the 75 per cent or so presidential candidate Senator John Kerry garnered in 2004. But exit polls from last week's election showed Obama matching those results, garnering about 78 per cent of the Jewish vote against 22 percent for Senator John McCain, his Republican rival.

Wallach credited the Democrat's late-campaign blitz of Jewish communities, joined by groups like his own, for converting the candidate from stranger to standardbearer for a Jewish ethos.

"It resonated much more than I thought it was going through in these parts of the Jewish community," he said.

It was an uphill battle, starting with rumors that Obama was a hidden Muslim, that he wasn't a genuine, born American. The subterranean campaign soon burst through semi-legitimate and then legitimate forums; Obama was not a Muslim, these conservatives and Republicans said, but he might have been raised a Muslim and later had radical associations.

The Republican Jewish Coalition ran ads coupling critiques on Obama's dovish policies with guilt-by-association jabs at his former pastor who embraced Third World liberation theology, at associates at the University of Chicago and during his early political career who had radical pasts, at advisers who had once delivered sharp critiques of Israel and the pro-Israel community. The negative campaign glossed over Obama's deep ties in the Chicago Jewish community and how he has picked a pre-eminently pro-Israel foreign policy team.

U.S. President-elect Barack Obama is given a T-shirt by Eli Moyal, the mayor of the southern Israeli town of Sderot, during a visit last summer. Obama vowed an "unshakable" commitment to Israel if he was elected president. [Edi Israel/Flash90 photo]

Matt Brooks, the Republican Jewish Coalition's executive director, said the ads raised legitimate questions about Obama's judgment, and had an effect: Obama was outpolling Kerry among Jews by only about two per cent, he said, while he was doing much better than Kerry had among other constituencies, including Catholics, blacks and Hispanics.

"This is a huge political tsunami that has hit Republicans across the board," Brooks said, referring to the economic crisis that helped precipitate Obama's blowout win last Tuesday.

"It's a testament to McCain that we've done as strongly as we have to hold onto our support," he said, noting that Obama's Jewish results lagged slightly behind showings for Al Gore in 2000 and for Bill Clinton in 1992 and 1996.

Brooks said he stood by his group's ad campaign. "There's no reason for regrets," he said. "We had an important and meaningful debate in the community."

Democrats said the overwhelming Jewish rejection of the campaign made them proud.

"I'm ecstatic by the outcome and the confidence the Jewish community showed Obama, in the teeth of some of the nastiest campaigning I've ever seen," said Ira Forman, the executive director of the National Jewish Democratic Council. "People got a chance in the last three months to see Barack Obama, and the idea that they should be afraid or frightened didn't wash."

Key to the effort were waves of Jewish surrogates, chief among them Democratic Congressman Robert Wexler, who blanketed Jewish communities in swing states in the campaign's final weeks. Wexler had been on board with the Obama campaign from the outset. A number of other surrogates who had been loyal to Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton added weight to the campaign once she conceded the primaries race over the summer.

"I've never seen a presidential campaign so well organized in the Jewish community," Forman said, referring to the Obama outreach effort.

It remains to be seen whether the concerns Brooks and the Republican Jewish Coalition pushed forward will eventuate. In his acceptance speech, Obama once again coupled diplomatic outreach with a tough take-all-comers posture.

"A new dawn of American leadership is at hand," he said. "To those who would tear the world down, we will defeat you. To those who seek peace and security, we support you."

J-Street, the liberal pro-Israel lobby that led a campaign to get Jewish newspapers to reject the Republican Jewish Coalition ads, said it was vindicated.

"Tonight, American Jews resoundingly rejected the two-year, multimillion dollar campaign of baseless smears and fear waged against him by the right wing of our community," J-Street's director, Jeremy Ben-Ami, said in a statement. "Surrogates and right-wing political operatives in our community stopped at nothing in their efforts to sway Jewish voters against Obama. With exit polls showing Barack Obama's share of the Jewish vote equal to 2004 levels, it is absolutely clear that their efforts failed."

Some Democrats said McCain, once popular among Jews because of his willingness to reach across the aisle, hurt himself in the community by choosing the deeply conservative and relatively inexperienced Alaska Gov. Sarah Palin as his running mate.

An American Jewish Committee poll commissioned in September found that 54 per cent of American Jews disapproved of the Palin pick, compared to just 15 per cent who disapproved of Obama's decision to tap Senator Joe Biden.

But Obama's appeal to Jews might have been most deeply rooted in shared values, said Mik Moore, Wallach's partner in JewsVote.org.

"Folks just wanted to be with us, with the more progressive candidate – it's where their heart is," he said.

Israel expects strong U.S. friendship to continue under Obama

© Ha'aertz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Democrat Barack Obama's election last Tuesday as the 44th president of the United States was welcomed by Palestinian and Israeli politicians alike, who expressed hope that under his leadership the peace process would continue and develop into something more tangible.

Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni said Israel hoped the president-elect would maintain the U.S. friendship with Israel and commitment to peace talks.

"Israel expects the close strategic co-operation with the new administration, president and Congress will continue, along with the continued strengthening of the special and unshakable special relationship between the two countries," she said.

In a statement, she called the Obama's election "a mark of merit for American democracy."

Livni added: "During Barack Obama's recent visit to Israel, and especially during the tour we conducted together in the city of Sderot, the people of Israel were impressed by his commitment to the peace and security of Israel."

Livni also thanked Republican presidential candidate Senator John McCain for his long-standing friendship. "[We] look forward to continuing our close co-operation with him."

Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat said he hoped that Obama would lead the U.S. along its current path of involvement in the Middle East peace talks and bring forward the settlement U.S. President George W. Bush had vowed to see before the end of his term.

"We hope the president-elect in the United States will stay the course and would continue the U.S. engagement in the peace process without delay. We hope the two-state vision would be transferred from a vision to a realistic track immediately," said Erekat, an aide to Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas.

In Israel, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert praised Obama's victory as "historic and impressive. America has again proven itself an example to world democracies."

Opposition leader Benjamin Netanyahu said Obama's victory represented a historic change for America, adding: "I am sure the new president will be able to bring peace to our region," he said.

Knesset member Ophir Pines-Pas said Obama must involve himself with the peace process immediately, at the start of his term. He also said that "the political system in Israel can look with astonishment and jealousy at democracy in the United States. Obama's victory gives hope to billions in the world, as well as in Israel."

Other Israeli lawmakers praised Obama's election as a victory against racism. Knesset member Shlomo Moula, an Ethiopian immigrant to Israel, said: "This is a victory that arouses hope in all black people in the world and in Israel. I am full of hope that Israel won't wait 400 years for equality."

Knesset member Yuval Steinitz said that Obama has already proven his "friendship to Israel… and his uncompromising commitment to curbing Iran's nuclear program."

At a celebratory reception at the King David Hotel in Jerusalem last Tuesday night, U.S. Ambassador James Cunningham said he could vouch for Obama's support of Israel, for the advancement of the peace process and for Israel's security.

Responsibility in Judaism

I recently heard of a couple who needed to make a relatively simple medical decision. They told the doctor they would ask their rabbi. I wondered: what kind of Judaism is this that calls for an intermediary?

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

When did it happen that we relinquished our direct connection to God and the consequential responsibility for our own actions? And how is it that I find this phenomenon in both the ultra-religious and non-practising sectors?

I was taught that when we pray, we pray directly to God – with no middleman, not even for women. A Jew's prayers ascend directly to HaShem, as is clear in the story of Hannah, the mother of Samuel, who, according to the Talmud, taught us how to pray.

Our private and public liturgy is based on this concept of direct access and immediacy. If synagogue services have come to rely on cantors and rabbis, it's not because they pray for us, but because they help us articulate and direct our prayers properly. No one prays for me. I must do it for myself. In too many shuls today, cantor and choir pray while the congregation is entertained.

What has happened in some circles, in all spectrums of the religious world, is that more and more Jews expect their rabbis to do Judaism for them.

I am fully aware of the many cases in which Jewish law would require a legal ruling, and hence rabbinic advice, for a medical or life-altering decision. There are also times when families are assisted by the comforting words or presence of their rabbi. Serious medical issues such as organ donation, end-of-life treatment and birthing problems may all involve the law and/or the wise counsel of a rabbi.

But all too often in parts of the ultra-religious world, there is a complete abdication of any form of individual decision-making. From finances to how many children to have to how to raise them, young couples feel inadequate to make any decisions. They rely on their rabbi for everything.

I remember having a feeling of inadequacy and vulnerability as a young parent. We made mistakes, but we couldn't refrain from living as adults. We had to make our own decisions. Without that level of maturity, one avoids taking responsibility for any actions. It makes life slippery, teflon-like and guilt-free. That is not the Judaism I know, which teaches human obligation and liability. We stand in a covenant with God, each individual alone and accountable.

Asking for advice when necessary is always a good idea, but we shouldn't let that displace our own decision-making or personal responsibility. Accepting and nourishing independence is difficult. But it's the essence of being human – created in the image of God.

Another look at the ballot

Vote, vote, vote: by the time this column is published, the United States election will have been decided (we hope).

At the same time in Vancouver, we are gearing up for our mayoral election on Nov. 15. Already, we have endured the federal election and one by-election in my provincial riding.

One is tempted to say, "Enough already – get on with it."

My last column dealt with what I thought were Jewish ethical values to consider when we choose our leaders and representatives to government. Time will tell whether or not the recent federal election results will reflect those values.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

But since the voting season is upon us, thinking about the vitality of a democracy in which we get to choose our leaders (wisely or not) made me question just how Jewish the one-person, one-vote system is.

Or maybe it's not a Jewish thing at all?

Halachic decisions aren't reached by popular vote. They're made by scholars whose years of study and acquired wisdom give them prerogatives to decide Halachah.

We don't vote on whether lobster is kosher. If we did, I know what my vote would be – but I digress.

Yes, minhag can sometimes trump the best intentions of the scholars of the day. It came as a surprise to find out that the ceremony of tashlich is not only a late innovation, but it's actually frowned upon by some authorities as smacking of superstition. So communal practice may override, at times, the best halachic intentions of the rabbis.

Yet in general, Judaism has depended on an elite group of scholars and is not what we would call a democratic system.

Yet Jews and Judaism flourish today only within democratic societies, not within authoritarian regimes. In fact, some sociologists have argued that Jews came to America already small "d" democrats, ready to embrace western ideas of democracy. The Haskalah, and the gradual removal of restrictions on Jews in the last two centuries in Europe – before the Nazis, of course – propelled Jews into the western mainstream almost as if they were shot out of a cannon. A tradition of intellectual toughness and style of argument – a talmudic mindset, if you will – enabled entry into every field of inquiry.

The "view from the edge," as it were, the ability of Jews to look from the outside into a field or problem, has been cited as one reason for the incredible contributions of Jews in so many fields. Often, the subject at hand would be one less explored, or brand-spanking new – to mention two very different ones, physics and Hollywood, for instance. (We see that other immigrant groups, too, have shown the same tendencies to excel quickly – I impute no supremacy to Jews.)

Many see danger in acceptance.

"For while Jews prospered and practised their religion unhindered, that very freedom had led to a laxity in observance and an erosion of scholarship and of the regard paid to rabbinical teachings and to the Law itself… [T]heir disappearance into a sea of assimilation and conversion was more than a remote possibility."

No, this wasn't written about German Jews, or North American ones. These lines are from the 2006 book Maimonides by Sherwin Nuland. He was referring to Jews in Rambam's Egypt of the 12th century!

But I see no other way forward for us today. We have all the access to power, privilege and prosperity that our ancestors could have wished for – and Judaism thrives in so many forms that at times we may, fleetingly, wish for one recognized standard.

But we've come too far for that to be a reality. Democracy has indeed influenced the ways we practise our Judaism and how we express our Jewishness. Some of this is good, as we combine the riches of secular science and thought with Jewish treasures. Some of it will be scary – the decline in denominational affiliations demonstrated in a recent survey done in Vancouver should be a wake-up call to denominations to examine their appeal to younger generations.

So what's the best way for us to exercise the franchise we have been given? Vote, and put energy into seeing that our institutions of power respond to the best Judaism that can teach them.

A portrait of distinction: Herbert Marx

Our tradition instils in us a commitment to community. We are fortunate that there are people who dedicate their time, resources and energy to ensure that our Canadian and Jewish institutions thrive. Some of these people are prominent, while others do their work quietly in the background. Whatever their style, it is important to recognize those who have made significant contributions to Canada and our Jewish community.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

One such individual, Herbert Marx, has contributed to the betterment of Canada through a lifetime of achievement in the academic community, in politics and on the bench. After leaving the judiciary, Marx continues his high level of activity and accomplishment.

Marx was largely educated in Montreal. He attended both Concordia University and the Université de Montréal. At the latter institution, he earned degrees in both English literature and law. He then went on to complete his master of laws degree at Harvard University, earning scholarships on the way. He completed the Quebec bar exams, finishing first, and was awarded the Prix du Barreau de Paris.

Shortly after, he was appointed a professor of constitutional law at the Université de Montréal. He not only taught in French, but went on to become the author of a constitutional law casebook, written entirely in French. This is quite an accomplishment for an Anglophone. Prior to its publication, when the manuscript was sent out for peer review, Marx was worried that someone would criticize his French. But to his credit, this did not occur.

Marx published several other books and articles on socially significant topics such as law and poverty and civil liberties. While performing his professorial duties, he also served for a period as a commissioner with the Quebec Human Rights Commission.

Marx then entered the realm of provincial politics. He was elected on three occasions, including landslide victories, to the Quebec National Assembly. He represented the Liberal party in the constituency of D'Arcy-McGee in Montreal.

Marx served with distinction as a member of the Quebec cabinet, holding the positions of Quebec's minister of justice and attorney general, solicitor general and minister responsible for Consumer Protection and, subsequently, minister of public security. Marx was the only Quebec minister of justice in Quebec history who was a member of the Jewish community.

After leaving politics, Marx was appointed a justice of the Quebec Superior Court, where he served with dignity and distinction.

Marx has always loved his province of Quebec and his home city of Montreal, and has an abiding affection for the Jewish community of Quebec. He served in various capacities in the Canadian Jewish Congress, was co-chair of the McGill Middle East Program in Civil Society and Peace Building, and served as an honorary governor of the Jewish General Hospital.

Justice Marx has always been highly supportive of the State of Israel.

He was an international governor of Tel Aviv University, and since his retirement as a Superior Court justice, he has served as president of the Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University.

I have known Marx for many years and have always been impressed with his commitment to the tasks he pursues. He brings a tenacious energy, an infectious sense of humour and a warm, engaging personality to his many undertakings.

Marx currently serves as president of the Association for Canadian Studies, an organization devoted to the promotion of the study of Canada both within our borders and internationally. Through his presidency of the association, he has underscored his love for our country and his desire that others discover and appreciate the richness of the Canadian experience.

Throughout his career, Marx has been supported by his devoted wife of 50 years, Eva, a keenly intelligent woman who shares his spirit of commitment to community. They enjoy their family of two children and three grandchildren.

Marx is a remarkable individual who continues to distinguish himself in his dedication to Canada, Israel and the Jewish values that serve as an example to all of us.

The Kirshner File

The heated Kasztner affair is re-examined

There is not the slightest trace of doubt or hesitation in Zsuzsi Kasztner's voice. "He was the greatest hero," she said unflinchingly. "Who else managed to save so many human beings?"

By her account, her father was a "defenceless" but courageous Jew who rose to the occasion in his dealings with the Gestapo in wartime German-occupied Hungary. "If that's not a description of a hero, I don't know what is," she mused.

Kasztner's daughter, Merav Michaeli, chimed in. "An injustice has been done."

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

They are talking about Rudolf Rezso Israel Kasztner, one of the most controversial Jewish figures in the annals of the Holocaust, a man whom some hail as a hero and others condemn as a traitor, a person who elicits both gratitude and hatred.

Fifty-one years after his assassination in Tel Aviv, American filmmaker Gaylen Ross has made a bracing documentary about Kasztner, a Budapest-based Jewish leader who has been praised and reviled for his role in extricating more than 1,600 Jews from the Nazi gas chambers.

Screened at the 33rd edition of the Toronto International Film Festival, Killing Kasztner is a sober examination of an episode that still resonates among Holocaust survivors.

Although Ross is basically sympathetic to Kasztner, she hopes that her film will generate debate. "I want the film to be a statement of what I think and believe," she said in an interview. "But I also want discussion and dialogue. I don't have an agenda."

Gaylen Ross

Kasztner, the individual at the epicentre of her movie, was a Zionist activist, lawyer and journalist who headed a small organization known as the Aid and Rescue Committee. In 1944, after Germany occupied Hungary, he repeatedly met Adolf Eichmann, the Nazi officer who was in charge of deporting Hungarian Jews to death camps in Poland, in an attempt to save as many Jews as possible. Kasztner seems to have been aware that Jews were being deported to Auschwitz at the rate of about 12,000 per day.

Kasztner and Eichmann reached an agreement whereby, in exchange for a handsome ransom consisting of money, diamonds and gold, 1,685 Jews would be permitted to board a special train bound directly for neutral Switzerland. Among the passengers on board were prominent Hungarian Jews, Kasztner family members and friends, Zionist youth movement leaders, Polish orphans and Rabbi Joel Teitelman, the Satmar rebbe, and his entire court.

They left Budapest on June 30, fully expecting to arrive in Switzerland within days. Instead, much to their consternation, the train pulled into the Bergen- Belsen concentration camp on July 9. They were held there for a while before almost all of them were allowed to continue their journey.

After the war, Kasztner and his family settled in Israel. In 1952, Malchiel Gruenwald – a Hungarian Jew who had immigrated to Palestine in 1938 – accused Kasztner, a spokesperson for the ministry of trade and industry, of having been a Nazi collaborator due to his connection to Eichmann and another SS officer, Kurt Becher..

The Israeli government sued Gruenwald for libel on behalf of Kasztner, a member of the ruling Mapai party. Gruenwald's attorney, Shmuel Tamir, a former Irgun fighter and a supporter of right-wing opposition leader Menachem Begin, claimed that Kasztner had been the Nazis' greatest Jewish agent. But in condemning him, Tamir turned the trial into a platform for excoriating the Mapai party.

When the two-year trial ended, the judge, Benjamin Halevi, opined that Kasztner had "sold his soul to the devil." Halevi reasoned that, by saving a few chosen Jews and not raising an alarm about Nazi genocidal aims, he had needlessly sacrificed far more Jews.

Consigned to pariah status, Kasztner became a recluse, while his wife suffered from depression. His daughter, meanwhile, was the object of physical attacks by schoolmates.

On March 3, 1957, Zeev Eckstein – a young right-wing radical alleged to be an Israeli undercover agent recruited to spy on his fellow rightists – shot Kasztner near his home in Tel Aviv. He died of his injuries days later. Eckstein and two accomplices, Yosef Menkes and Dan Shemer, were imprisoned but pardoned and set free after seven years.

A year after Kasztner's assassination, Israel's Supreme Court overturned much of Halevi's verdict on the grounds that Kasztner's motives and behaviour stood the test of plausibility and reasonableness.

The Kasztner affair, said Ross, was Israel's first full-bore encounter with the effects of the Holocaust, preceding the celebrated Eichmann war crimes trial by several years.

For Ross, an American filmmaker whose father's Polish Jewish family perished in the Holocaust, the Kasztner story provokes an array of questions. In a director's statement, she asks, "Who is a hero? The one who picks up arms or the one who sits down with his enemies? Who determines how we choose heroes? Historians? Popular culture? Myth?"

In her judgment, Kasztner rescued Jews under conditions of the greatest duress, with a figurative gun at his head.

Although she declined to categorize him as either a hero or a villain, and she acknowledged that he had a flawed personality that included an arrogant streak, she said that he was nonetheless demonized by survivors who had lost relatives in the Holocaust and sought scapegoats.

"He became a flashpoint for blame," observed Ross, a former actress and model who was born Gail Sue Rosenblum in 1950 and appeared in George Romero's classic horror film, Dawn of the Dead, before turning to documentary filmmaking. "I say, let's blame the Nazis."

Refuting the claim that Kasztner deliberately kept Hungarian Jews in the dark about the Nazis' Final Solution, she said that he dispatched emissaries to Jewish communities and sent hundreds of telegrams warning of Germany's plan to exterminate European Jewry.

Kasztner and his daughter, Zsuzsi

"He did everything possible to help," said Ross, one of whose previous films is Blood Money: Switzerland's Nazi Gold.

Politically, in Israel, Kasztner was seen as a symbol of the left-of-centre Mapai party, which rightists tried to bring down, she noted.

Ross stumbled upon the Kasztner case 20 years ago when she read a book about him. "It was a fantastic tale I had never heard before. I didn't hear about it again until over a decade later, when I met a survivor who had been on the Kasztner train."

Fascinated by this intriguing historical footnote, which she describes as a "drama of epic proportions," she delved deeper into it, amazed by the undiminished anger and bitterness it aroused.

Apart from meeting Zsuzsi Kasztner and her three grown daughters, Merav, Michal and Keren Michaeli, she interviewed Eckstein and Tamir's son, who also appear in the film, one of whose themes turns on Zsuzsi's efforts to exonerate her father.

Ross believes that, judging by Yad Vashem's decision in 2007 to accept Kasztner's archives, public opinion in Israel may finally be shifting toward Zsuzsi Kasztner's interpretation of events. But in a cautionary note, she added, "There will always be people who'll say Kasztner is tainted."

Zsuzsi Kasztner and her daughters fervently hope that Kasztner will eventually be exonerated, and in this spirit, they encourage historians, journalists and filmmakers to conduct research.

They are heartened by their perception that he is not as savaged today as he was in the past, but they realize that Kasztner's name will not be cleared anytime soon.

As Merav euphemistically put it, "There are still resistant pockets."

J.B. Salsberg remembered 10 years later

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

The life of Joseph (J.B.) Salsberg, humanist, labour leader, political activist, politician, CJN columnist and a man who dedicated his life to Yiddishkeit and the advancement of social justice, was remembered and honoured recently on his 10th yahrzeit.

More than 300 people gathered Oct. 28 at Bialik Hebrew Day School for a program titled J.B. Remembered, under the auspices of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Committee for Yiddish as part of its program called Yiddish Canada in the 20th Century.

At the entrance to the auditorium was an archival display, developed by the Ontario Jewish Archives, titled J.B. Remembered: The Life and Career of J.B. Salsberg, featuring five large panels: Immigration and Early Life, Labour Zionism and Union Work, Political Life, Soviet Anti-Semitism and the Break with Communism, and Life After Politics.

MC Sharyn Salsberg Ezrin spoke of her uncle J.B. as a fixture in the Canadian and Jewish landscapes.

"J.B. would have been delighted that you all have an interest in Yiddish and such an evening of music and recollection."

On a personal note, she said her uncle was her mentor. Some 40 years ago, when she was interested in becoming a volunteer at a Hashomer Hatzair kibbutz near Ashkelon, she said that her "interest in Israel was the spark that brought us together and continued for many years."

A short video was presented of Salsberg in 1991, when he was turning 90. His warmth and sincerity set the mood of remembrance and gratitude.

The details of Salsberg's life could fill volumes. Born in Lugov Poland, he immigrated to Canada with his family when he was 11 years old. He attended Lansdowne Public School for two years, and at 13, he left school to help support his family by working as a leather cutter in a purse factory.

He was moved by the injustices he observed in the sweatshops of downtown Toronto and took his first steps into social activism in the union movement.

His strong feelings about equality and equal rights for all led him to join the Communist Party in 1926. In 1938, he was elected alderman for Ward 4, a position he held until 1943, when he was elected to the Ontario legislature in the riding of St. Andrew.

J.B. Salsberg

After hearing rumours that Jewish institutions in the Soviet Union were being closed and that Jews were being murdered, Salsberg went to Russia and met with Soviet leader Nikita Khrushchev.

He was told not to make it a public issue. On his return to Canada, in 1957 he renounced his affiliation with the Communist Party and the United Jewish People's Order and formed the New Fraternal Jewish Association.

Susan Jackson, executive philanthropic officer at UJA Federation, said Salsberg brought clarity to issues in a way that no one else could. "His filibusters were not only legendary in parliament, but at meetings of the Toronto and Canadian Jewish Congress," she said.

"J.B. was an extraordinary figure in the life of the province," added Bob Rae, a former NDP premier of Ontario and current Liberal MP.

Rae shared his recollections of Salsberg, describing him as a proud Jew, "a very great Canadian – a figure of enormous power and enormous strength in the life of our city."

He added: "J.B. was a representative of his generation who cared for social justice, who transformed not only the Jewish community, but the whole working community in Toronto."

Under the direction of Nella Koren, the Bialik choir presented a musical program of popular Yiddish songs, including Dos iz Yiddish and Tumbalaleika.

Keynote speaker, Prof. Gerald Tulchinsky, professor emeritus of history at Queen's University, also spoke about Salsberg's life and times.

Tulchinsky was selected to organize Salsberg's political and labour union correspondence. The collection is available for primary research at the university.

He noted that Salsberg shone as a member of the Ontario legislature. "He was into every issue – he was on his feet almost all the time making excellent points."

Tulchinsky spoke of Salsberg's political idealism, which led him from a religious Jewish life to Zionism and Communism, because of his desire to help the working class who, at that time, had no protections.

After Salsberg left the Communist Party, his columns in The CJN were "enormously important. Above all else, he was connected with people in a very special way," Tulchinsky said.

"While most people could walk down Spadina from College to Dundas in a space of 15 minutes, it took Joe Salsberg about three hours. He met people he knew and people he didn't know. He would say hello and try to get them in conversation, not just on a political level but on a human level."

Paying tribute to Salsberg and his love of Yiddish and Yiddish music, singer-songwriter Lenka Lichtenberg performed haunting Yiddish songs, including music she wrote to the poems of Simcha Simchovich, Tsum Kval and Meyh Rue Platz.

Netanyahu may become Israel's next PM, analyst says

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

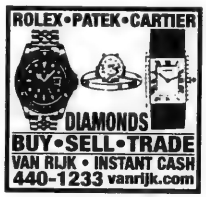
Benjamin Netanyahu might well win back his old job as prime minister after Israel's general election next winter, says the former political adviser to Yitzhak Rabin, the late Israeli premier.

In an interview last week, Yoram Peri said that the most recent public opinion polls suggest that Netanyahu, the leader of the right-wing Likud party, and Tzipi Livni, the head of the centre-right Kadima party, will each win about 30 Knesset seats when Israeli voters cast their ballots on Feb. 10.

"But Netanyahu has a better chance of forming a government because the religious and right-wing bloc is larger than the centre-left bloc," explained Peri, the director of the Chaim Herzog Institute for Media, Politics and Society at Tel Aviv University.

Currently a visiting scholar at the American University in Washington, D.C., and a former editor of the Hebrew daily Davar, he predicted that Netanyahu's re-election will definitely slow down Israel's peace process with both the Palestinians and Syria.

"Whether it will stop it I'm not sure," said Peri, who was spokesperson for the Labor party during Golda Meir's term as prime minister from 1968 to 1974.



Peri, in Toronto to deliver a lecture on Israel's current political situation, said that Netanyahu, if re-elected, may well moderate his hard-line views because Israeli prime ministers have a record of pursuing policies they railed against while in opposition.

He cited several examples.

Rabin promised to retain the Golan Heights, but informed Syria he would withdraw under certain conditions. Ehud Barak said Jerusalem would always remain in Israel's hands, but at the Camp David summit, he agreed that Arab neighbourhoods could be ceded to the Palestinians. Ariel Sharon declared he would not negotiate with the Palestinians until the second intifadah was crushed, but later changed his mind.

Yoram Peri

Similarly, during Netanyahu's reign as prime minister from 1996 to 1999, he shifted course and sent an envoy to Damascus signalling his intention to relinquish most of the Golan Heights as part of a a peace treaty.

Whoever succeeds Ehud Olmert as prime minister will have to factor Israel's new consensus into his or her calculations, said Peri, whose appearance here was co-sponsored by Canadian Friends of Peace Now, New Israel Fund Canada and Na'amat Canada.

Under this consensus, he noted, Israeli voters regard West Bank settlements as an obstacle to peace, yet have little or no faith in the Palestinians' ability to fully honour a peace accord.

"This is a prescription for paralysis," he observed.

Yet in the last year, he added, Israel and the Palestinian Authority have forged considerable progress toward signing an eventual peace accord.

According to Peri, Israel has agreed in principle to hand over 98 per cent of the West Bank to the Palestinian Authority, while retaining two per cent to accommodate about two-thirds of its settlements. In exchange, Israel would transfer two per cent of its sovereign territory to the Palestinians in a land swap.

Peri, however, warned that a final accord will be beyond reach unless Hamas accepts it. "Maybe there's a need to involve Hamas," he said. "Hamas might be ready for an agreement down the road."

Peri also said that Israel's current truce with Hamas will endure if its talks with the Palestinian Authority continue.

Israel should seriously consider an Arab League proposal under which Israel would return the pre-1967 territories and resolve the Palestinian refugee problem in exchange for global recognition from the Arabs, Peri said.

"It should be looked at positively. It's the most progressive document ever published by the Arab states. It represents a dramatic change in Arab thinking."

Asked why Israel has not responded to the overture, he replied, "We're too busy with our domestic politics."

Peri said the next American president, Barack Obama, will try harder than his predecessor, George W. Bush, to defuse the Arab-Israeli conflict, with the result that Israel's talks with the Palestinians will move forward and Israel and Syria will be better able to advance the prospects for peace.

In Peri's judgment, the Syrian leadership is willing to come to terms with Israel. "Bashar Assad is a serious negotiator," he said in a reference to Syria's president. "He means business. We can reach an agreement with Syria."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

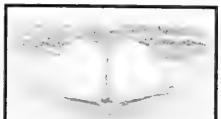
The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Jewish Life

Making the effort to do mitzvot

By RABBI AVRAM ROTHMAN

This week's parshah introduces us to our forefather Abraham just a few short days after his brit milah. As one might expect, for even the strongest of men, such a procedure would be quite painful and difficult. For Abraham, a man of very advanced years, that was certainly the case.



Rabbinic Reflections

The Talmud teaches us that following Abraham's milah surgery, God wanted to make sure that he had some rest. Therefore, in order to make sure that no one would come to bother Abraham, God made the day uncharacteristically hot.

However, Abraham, himself, had different plans. Rather than resting, the hot weather only caused Abraham to be upset that he had no visitors to greet, feed and welcome into his home. He wanted, regardless of the pain, to open his home to visitors and those in need. Therefore, God sent the three angels described in our parshah, who came dressed as Arabs.

But how does this solve the problem?

The angels were completely spiritual beings who did not and could not eat the meal that Abraham provided to them. They pretended to eat the food, but why would God not send someone who could benefit from the food?

Frankly, if we only get one such example in the Torah, why not make sure it's a perfect example of how Abraham's kindness filled the bellies of the travellers and made them feel better?

God could have sent a thunderstorm that would have lowered the temperature. People would then have resumed their travels, and Abraham would have had guests to feed. This would seem more logical than wasting Abraham's efforts preparing a gourmet meal for the angels, who had to pretend to eat.

This incident teaches us about the nature of our responsibility to the Torah and to others.

Contrary to what we may think, hachnasat orchim (the welcoming and feeding of guests) is not judged on the completion of the mitzvah, but rather on the effort.

Abraham was unable to truly "feed" the angels, because they did not and could not eat. He couldn't finish the job, but it's not the finishing that's required, it's the effort, the trying.

This is why the showcase chapter about hachnasat orchim in the Torah is told about people who could not in any way benefit from the mitzvah.

You see, this clearly teaches us that, Judaism is not a religion that measures success by results. Judaism measures success by effort.

Contrary to what the "immortal" Vince Lombardi would have had us believe – that is, that "winning isn't everything, it's the only thing" – it's not the result that counts, but the effort that must be made. The Almighty doesn't expect us to change the world, but he expects us to try.

Abraham understood that we all have to make the effort. We need to reach out to help, feed, greet and assist people with their physical needs. But it's not our job to finish the task, it's our job to put in the effort.

It's not our responsibility to worry about the bottom line in these cases. People need only worry about "putting in the effort" and doing their best to help others. Sometimes people don't want to be helped. Sometimes we don't have the tools to complete the job. But that's not our worry. We need to take the time to try, to care and to do our best. It's the effort that makes the difference.

Rabbi Avram Rothman is spiritual leader of the Thornhill Community Shul.

Obama's historic moment

IDEAS ON IDENTITY

By Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

I write this just after midnight in the wee hours of Nov. 5. I must admit, I was riveted by the American elections. Yes, I am a Canadian, and yes, I did vote in our own elections, but the drama of the U.S. elections kept me going back for more.

I hoped that women would not be fooled into thinking that just because a politician is a woman that she might actually care about women's issues and women's rights. I watched as Barack Obama tried to get people to move past his name, his colour and the Muslim father he never knew. Slanderous e-mails about him kept finding their way into my inbox, hearsay and innuendo all directed specifically to the Jewish community and designed to produce fear. And yet, unbelievably, a black man rose to the presidency of the very country that would have enslaved him just a few decades ago.

In his concession speech, John McCain was the model of civility, grace and all the best that America stands for. And Obama held forth an inspiring promise of hope, peace and prosperity. They both spoke like true menschen. It was a political moment from which the leaders of many other countries could learn.

I know what it's like to have people judge you not by your accomplishments, but by some circumstance of your birth: in his case his colour, in mine my gender. I know what it's like to have people who are uncomfortable with your position tell you that so freely, and let you know that if it just wasn't for this one little "flaw," you'd be great at what you do. I know what it's like to have people smile at you but behind your back pass you over for someone less qualified. I know what it's like to have opportunities denied to you because people are still unable to see beyond a body to a human being – neither white nor black, male nor female, gay nor straight, young nor old, just human.

As the child of working class parents and the first in my extended family to attend a private university, I know what it means to try to "rise above" and then be castigated for being an elitist. I know what it means to try harder than other people have to just to get what they've received so easily. And I've learned a lot from Obama's campaign about having a respectful dialogue with people you disagree with.

I feel blessed to be living in this historic time. My university-age son in Boston, a dual citizen who is not usually interested in politics, was moved to vote, and he called me with deeply felt emotion when he stepped out of the voting booth. His Facebook profile then said, "I can one day tell my children that I voted in the most historic election of my lifetime."

Now that the American hoopla is over, the hard work begins, and we can go back to paying attention to Canadian politics. We're so lucky in Canada that we long ago learned to celebrate our diversity and to elect officials and governments that reflect the full mosaic of Canadian life.

Tonight, another great nation demonstrated that we are capable of seeing one another as simply human.

Jewish Life

Higher markets

Money Matters

By Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

As the financial markets continue on their wild rides, analysts from all walks of life continue to debate the causes that led to the meltdown in the hope of preventing the next one. Sub-prime mortgages, lack of regulation, regulations forcing banks to lend to unworthy clients, high oil prices, low interest rates, real estate prices that rose too high, too fast – the list of causes seems to grow daily. People who were previously viewed as champions of free enterprise are today vilified for lax oversight.

When these conditions existed a few short months ago, as markets flirted with all-time highs, no one seemed to notice any problems until it was too late. China's growing middle class, low interest rates and other such things were going to keep the world economy on fire for years to come, and investment bankers and brokers – some of whom are now unemployed – continued to urge investors to pour money into the markets.

While economic cycles have been the norm since at least the time of Joseph in Egypt, people intuitively understand that we're not truly dealing with an economic crisis, but rather a moral one. Greed, excessive materialism, hubris and jealousy are among the deeper causes of the current upheaval.

Time magazine recently ran a story that interviewed two leading Jewish "ethicists" who describe how the implementation of Jewish law and values in the marketplace could possibly have helped prevent much of the upheaval we are witnessing. What is most interesting is that a secular magazine would see the merit in such arguments.

A central theme throughout Jewish thought is that holiness can be found in the most mundane of activities. This is especially true regarding our business activities. The modern worker has the potential to sanctify God's name on a daily basis by demonstrating not only honesty, integrity and sensitivity, but modesty.

In an era when conspicuous consumption is a central feature of marketing, it's even more crucial that we recognize that money is only a means to an end. Conspicuous consumption is apparently no longer in vogue, as the super-wealthy recognize the poor taste of flouting their "success" in the current environment – a modest positive side effect of the current crisis.

The late Rabbi Shimon Schwab, leader of the transplanted German community after the war, commented that only in America did he encounter the notion of making money as a goal in and of itself. In the German milieu of Torah im derech eretz (Torah and worldly wisdom) in which he was raised, making money was important as a means to leading a full Jewish life.

Among the Temple sacrifices that the Torah mandates is an oleh vevored, which literally means "up and down." Unlike other sacrifices in which the actual sacrifice is fixed for all, the oleh veyored varies depending on the economic situation of the one bringing the sacrifice: the wealthy bringing animals, the less so birds, and the indigent flour. The Sefer HaChinuch (the classic compilation and explanation of the 613 mitzvot) notes that a poor person who brings the sacrifice designed for the wealthy would not fufil their obligation. Living beyond ones means is prohibited not only in the "secular" world but in the "religious" one as well.

Rabbi Efraim Lunshitz (who lived in 16th-century Poland) has a fascinating (albeit debatable) explanation as to why the Torah (in theory, at least) prohibits the charging and receiving of interest. He explains that having a steady fixed and guaranteed stream of income without actually doing any work diminishes our ability to see God as our material provider. It's best to have some degree of uncertainty regarding our financial future, he believed, so that we remain focused on our Divine provider.

Jewish distance learning

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

You can be part of a virtual classroom that's as far away as your keyboard. Today: Jewish university studies on the web.

Some courses are self-directed and you work at your own pace. Others use live, classroom-based videoconferencing that allows students and instructors to communicate directly with each other, face to face. Still others are conducted via e-mail and a website. The instructor posts a lecture or assignment. Participants have a few days to do the required work.

Courses offered by degree-granting universities normally charge a fee. (Next week we'll look at some free courses.) Access to online materials in these courses is usually restricted to enrolled students who have a password. Most universities view their distance learning courses equal in workload and as demanding as their classroom-based courses and offer comparable credits. The Jewish Theological Seminary has a great overview of what to expect when you study via the web, as well as tips on How to Be an Excellent Online Student. [tinyurl.com/excelonline]

And as with any product or service you order through the Internet, check out the credibility of the educational institution before you invest your time and money.

Reuven Kalifon makes his home at Kibbutz Tzuba in the Judean hills outside Jerusalem. But he's earning his master's in the online Jewish studies program at Pennsylvania's Gratz College. With the incredible array of universities in Israel, why go online to the United States? Kalifon explains that when he decided to return to school for formal graduate studies, he wanted the flexibility of an online program so that he wouldn't need to miss work or spend time commuting to Jerusalem for class. [tinyurl.com/kalifon] Gratz College also offers online degrees and certificate programs in Jewish education and Jewish non-profit management. [tinyurl.com/gratzde]

Got your master's and looking for an even bigger challenge? Then consider enrolling in Spertus College's doctor of Jewish studies program. The course is identical to the one offered at the Chicago campus but allows the flexibility of home study. Course packages include audio/video tapes, "intensive weeklong summer seminars in Chicago, independent study and directed reading courses." [tinyurl.com/spertus]

Hebrew College is a pioneer in Jewish education on the Internet and has been accredited to offer masters of arts in Jewish studies since 2000. You can take an online placement test to see where you would place in college's five levels of Hebrew classes. [tinyurl.com/hebtest]

Jewish teachers who wish to upgrade their skills can look to the Merkaz i.t. L'Morim Project at Toronto's York University. Beth Emeth rabbi to be honoured for 50 years of service

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Joseph Kelman finds it hard to believe that his life goal in 1948, when he graduated from Yeshiva University with a BA in history, was to establish a chair in Jewish history at the University of Toronto.

The descendent of a long rabbinic line and a recipient of numerous honours, Rabbi Kelman instead became a rabbi, the eighth (but not last) generation in his family to do so.

This week the father of three and grandfather of 10 is being honoured by Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue at a tribute dinner where he is receiving its Yakir Hakahal (Precious to the Community) award on Wednesday night for 50 years of service to both synagogue and community.

Reflecting on the five decades he has spent as spiritual leader, now emeritus, of the shul, he said in a recent interview that growing up in a rabbinic home was one factor influencing his career choice. The other was his desire to serve the community.

Rabbi Joseph Kelman [Frances Kraft photo]

As well, he said, he was struck as a yeshiva student by comments from a disillusioned pulpit rabbi. "I want to be a rabbi and see if I can still be an idealist," he recalls thinking.

At 81 years of age, he believes he has achieved that goal.

He has experienced "very little" politics during his tenure at Beth Emeth and credits the synagogue for allowing him "to become a pioneer" in working on behalf of Jewish children and adults with special needs.

The rabbi began a bar/bat mitzvah program for children who are developmentally delayed in the early 1960s, which was, to the best of his knowledge, the first of its kind.

He also founded Kadimah, a school that provided Jewish education for students with developmental disabilities, and co-founded Ezra, a program for students with learning disabilities; the now-defunct Dr. Abraham Shore She'arim Hebrew Day School, to educate children with learning disabilities; and Reena, an organization that integrates adults with developmental disabilities into the community.

A chair of the North America-wide committee on special education under the auspices of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism for more than 30 years, Rabbi Kelman was instrumental in having children who are developmentally disabled integrated into Ramah camps, and was also involved in prison and hospital chaplaincy, particularly at psychiatric institutions. He has also led many missions to Israel, often with Christian Zionist colleagues.

The rabbi – who still teaches a weekly Talmud class, visits the sick, and officiates at life cycle events – credits his late mother, who was widowed when he was just 9 years old, for her influence on him and his five siblings.

A former national president of Mizrachi, his mother was also an organizer of a march through Kensington Market to protest against Jewish businesses remaining open on Shabbat. Rabbi Kelman's older brothers Abraham and the late Wolfe, a longtime leader in the Conservative movement, also became rabbis.

Rabbi Kelman came to the then fledgling Beth Emeth in 1959, when it consisted of 100 families.

His recollections of the early days include serving as principal of the five-day-a-week congregational school, instituting programs including a "tallis and tfillin club" for young boys, and knocking on doors in the neighbourhood, looking for potential new members. By the time he retired in 1997, the congregation had grown to more than 1,500 families.

Israel must withdraw to pre-'67 borders: Peri

For peace to materialize, he said, Israel must withdraw to the pre-1967 lines and Syria must disassociate itself from Iran, and cease supporting Hezbollah and radical Palestinian groups.

Assad may be prepared to make such concessions in the interests of achieving a rapprochement with the United States and the West and ensuring the stability and legitimacy of his Baathist regime.

Yet the major issue in the Middle East today is Iran. As he put it, "If Iran goes nuclear, the whole balance of power in the region will change."

Israeli military action against Iran's nuclear sites is not a viable option, he said. "It would be too dangerous, too frightening. Iran might strike Israel, attack Jews all over the world, hit oil wells in Saudi Arabia and heat up the Lebanese front with Hezbollah."

Suggesting a diplomatic approach, Peri advised Israel to settle the Palestinian issue and move Syria out of Iran's orbit before dealing with Iran's nuclear ambitions.

Peri is certain that if Rabin had lived, the current Palestinian uprising would not have erupted and Israel would have signed a peace treaty with Syria.

"Yigal Amir achieved his aims," he said, referring to Rabin's assassin.

Jihadism can be crushed, says Klein Halevi

It may be Israel's fate to stand up to Iran and thereby save the Middle East and the world from a nuclear-armed Iran, he observed.

Yet the prospect of a nuclear Iran alarms not only Israel, but also Sunni Arab states, Klein Halevi said.

In his view, Israel will take action against Iran within the framework of fighting the forces of jihadism.

The Palestinian problem can't be resolved unless Iran, a prime backer of Hamas, is contained. He urged Obama to follow a policy of containment with respect to Iran.

Striking an upbeat note, Klein Halevi said that jihadism can be crushed, much like Nazi Germany and Soviet Communism were defeated.

First female cantor featured in upcoming concert

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Barbara Ostfeld says that becoming the first female cantor in North America was an accident of timing.

Now the placement director of the American Conference of Cantors based in Buffalo, N.Y., Ostfeld said in a telephone interview that when she sent in her application to the Reform movement's Hebrew Union College–Jewish Institute of Religion in the early 1970s, she didn't know she was the first woman to apply, or to be accepted.

"The primary battle had already been fought. [Rabbi] Sally Priesand, the first woman to be accepted into the rabbinical school, was already in the second year of her studies. The time had come for a woman [cantor] to train."

Ostfeld will be here on Nov. 19 to take part in a concert at Leah Posluns Theatre titled Kol Isha: A Cantorial Celebration of Women's Voices, hosted by Kolel, the Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning.

Other singers include Tara Abrams, cantorial soloist, Temple Har Zion; Dawn Bernstein, cantorial soloist, Temple Kol Ami; Aviva Chernick, cantorial soloist, Shaarei-Beth El Congregation; Phyllis Angel Greenberg, rosh hazzanut, Congregation Darchei Noam; Lindi Rivers, cantorial soloist, Holy Blossom Temple; and Anna Trubashnik, cantor, Temple Emanu-El.

Ostfeld, 55, who is married with two daughters, ages 25 and 22, has served at Temple Beth Am in Buffalo, N.Y., and Temple Beth El, in Great Neck, N.Y.

She said that she decided to become a cantor when she was a child. "I had no female role models, but I loved my cantor [Martin Rosen] from Oak Park Temple in Chicago. He had a big, glorious voice and was terrific with kids. He knows he was a big factor in my decision."

Female cantors are predominant in the Reform movement now, she said, and "if you flashed a picture of me in front of people's eyes, I think they would see a cantor, not a female cantor."

Ostfeld said, however, that every woman in religious life has struggles that plague her in her particular environment.

"There is still a small minority that persists in wondering if the buck can really stop at the desk of a woman, if a life-cycle event performed by a woman is really kosher, and if congregants would feel more comfortable with a man," she said.

"These people are few, though, and many of us no longer face these issues."

Ostfeld said she didn't consider becoming a rabbi, because "I am moved by liturgy and Jewish ritual. I see the ultimate fulfilment in the cantorate.

Barbara Ostfeld

"Cantors exude a lot of spiritual energy. They have to be very focused on the text and be able draw in the congregants and encourage them to participate. We have to be attuned to their mood, and to the mood of the prayers, and all the while we can't lose the realization that everything is directed heavenward."

Cantors feel like they're juggling, she said. "All the balls have to stay in the air, but we have to hold on to one more tightly at any given moment. We're not performing, though. There is no sense of audience except for the Divine, and the Divine is not involved in the high notes. 'She' is invoked by sincerity, and is not concerned with fancy vocals.

"Texts are meant to be chanted, and without melodies the services would be flat. Cantors have to convey the Jewish message through music."

The upcoming concert, which will feature solo and ensemble work, both liturgical and popular, is an important one, Ostfeld said, because it is a first. "It would not have been possible a generation ago."

Tickets are available through the Kolel office at 416-636-1880, ext. 255.

Lipa Green expansion, new Prosserman JCC underway

Phase I Construction slated for July 2009 completion

By Barbi Green & Daniel Horowitz

Since its creation in 1983, the Lipa Green Building for Jewish Community Services, located on Bathurst Street, just north of Sheppard Avenue, has proudly served the needs of Toronto's Jewish community.

Today, as that community continues to grow and flourish, UJA Federation's Tomorrow Campaign – its unprecedented, $400 million infrastructure project – is rebuilding and revitalizing Jewish centres of life across the Greater Toronto Area, keeping pace with our burgeoning community.

Currently, the Tomorrow Campaign is mid-way through completion of the construction of two new floors at the base of the Lipa Green Building and the construction of the 40,000 square foot Gales Family Pavilion of the Prosserman Jewish Community Centre, both key components of the Sherman Campus.

Due to its unique structure – the Lipa Green Building was elevated on stilts giving it the height of a seven-storey structure – the Tomorrow Campaign will be "filling in" the first two levels. The new River Level floor will house a state-of-the-art Conference Centre that will feature the beautiful Tamari Family Conference Hall, a formal boardroom, several meeting rooms and a fully equipped Teleconferencing Centre.

The Courtyard Level (First Floor) will be home to the new Jewish Family & Child (JF&CS), which has for decades provided counseling, education, prevention and protection for families and individuals throughout the Greater Toronto Area. In their new location, clients and visitors will use an independent Courtyard Level entrance, providing more dignified and private access to the services within.

A number of agencies including JIAS (Jewish Immigrant Aid Services) Toronto and the Toronto Jewish Free Loan Cassa will become integral parts of the Lipa Green Building's Community Services Wing. Space will also be dedicated to Israel Experience agencies such as Taglit Birthright Israel and the Israel Aliyah Centre, to name a few.

Meanwhile, the Gales Family Pavilion, scheduled to open at the beginning of July 2009, will enjoy a seamless transition of its daycare centre currently housed in the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre to its new, nine-classroom, 175 student, state-of-the-art Early Childhood Education Centre. As well, the Gales Family Pavilion will house an exciting seniors' recreation centre with a relaxing lounge and activity room, a computer teaching lab, culinary arts studio, light fitness and dance studios, and multi purpose rooms providing a venue for the eclectic array of programs to be offered by the Prosserman JCC. The Koffler Centre of the Arts will also have several dedicated rooms for the continuation of their ceramics and painting programs on the campus.

The steel for the bridge connecting the Lipa Green Building and Gales Family Pavilion is already in place. This important link is the first of many that will connect all of the buildings on Sherman Campus, creating one seamless space that can be readily – and pleasantly – traveled through good weather and bad.

Upon completion, the new Lipa Green Building for Jewish Community Services and the Gales Family Pavilion will change the face of Jewish life for community members throughout the Greater Toronto Area.

By Daniel Horowitz

Situated in the geographic heart of Jewish Toronto within a magnificent ravine setting, Sherman Campus is being brought to life. Serving our seniors, adults, teens, young families and children, Sherman Campus will bring together the best that the Jewish community has to offer. It will be known for excellence and innovation in social, recreational, fitness, health and wellness, communal, educational and cultural services and programs. Open to everyone, Sherman Campus will be a welcoming place that is architecturally exciting, accessible, and a hub of social and communal engagement. Below, a photo montage illustrates the ongoing construction on the site.

Sherman Campus will be home to:

Rabbi says religion not the cause of wars

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

These days, Rabbi David Wolpe – author of the recently published book Why Faith Matters – spends much of his time making a case for religious belief.

But as a young adult, he didn't believe in God, he said in an Oct. 30 speech at Beth Sholom Synagogue. He lost his faith at around age 12 after seeing the movie Night and learning about the Holocaust. In his early 20s, he started to "doubt my doubts," he said.

The California-based Conservative rabbi, whose father is also a Conservative rabbi, is the spiritual leader of Sinai Temple in Los Angeles. He has written seven books, teaches at the University of California, Los Angeles, and was named one of the 100 most influential Jews in America by the Forward newspaper in 2003. Newsweek magazine named him the number 1 pulpit rabbi in America earlier this year, and ranked him number 12 this year and number 18 last year among its Top 50 Influential Rabbis in America.

But on a personal level, he has faced challenges that would test anyone's faith– his wife's bout with cancer six months after the birth of their daughter, his own surgery for a benign brain tumour, and his subsequent battle with lymphoma, from which he is now in remission.

At a time when there has been "a [recent] spate of best-selling books that promote atheism," Rabbi Wolpe said that the way some people conceive of faith is "not just less than what faith is. It's in some ways in opposition to what faith is."

Drawing on his own experience, the rabbi said that when he was going through chemotherapy, he didn't pray for God to heal him, because he doesn't believe that God works that way – curing those who pray and not curing those who don't.

"You can pray for acceptance, strength and closeness, and that prayer, I believe, gets answered."

The rabbi – who had debated Christopher Hitchens, author of God Is Not Great, the previous night in New York – said it's rare for him to get into a discussion about religion and not have people say that religion causes people to kill each other.

Rabbi David Wolpe

"I had to try to figure out for myself what it is that makes people kill each other," Rabbi Wolpe said, recalling the process of writing his most recent book.

He concluded that "human nature has people killing each other in all sorts of settings. If you think human beings are basically good, you should visit a playground. What happens when a new child comes to the playground? Do children say, 'Let us embrace that child and share our toys with him?'" No. It's 'Let's get the new kid.'

"It takes a lot of work to make a child good. That's not because we don't have goodness in us. We have a lot of goodness. We have both. It takes a good deal of work to raise the quotient of goodness and to redirect the selfishness, pettiness and ego that's inside us."

If Judaism, Christianity and Islam were the cause of fighting, the world "must have been a garden" before religion developed, the rabbi posited. "But the world was a savage bloodbath before the rise of these monotheistic faiths," he said, citing wars in Carthage as an example.

"Religion sometimes manages to overcome human nature and have people live in peace, but not always," he said.

He added that even religious wars usually have other elements, including land, power, politics and money.

"Religion alone is not what is wrong with the world," he asserted. It is the "only universal value" that can help, he believes.

First Nations chief addresses panel

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The struggle against racism and discrimination requires that people be informed and educated, said Phil Fontaine, national chief of the Assembly of First Nations, who spoke last week as part of Holocaust Education Week.

At Ryerson University's Peter Bronfman Learning Centre, Fontaine was part of a Nov. 3 panel speaking about "Justice, Responsibility and Forgiveness: Legacies of the Holocaust and the Persecution of Aboriginal Canadians."

Also on the panel were Erna Paris, author of Long Shadows, a book about historical memory, international justice and reconciliation, and Leora Schaefer, program director of Facing History and Ourselves Canada, an educational organization that aims to teach students about racism, prejudice and anti-Semitism.

Schaefer said people often ask why we need to inform children about disturbing atrocities of the past, such as the Holocaust.

She said the information students are presented with leads them to ask more questions, such as who should be accountable, how justice can be achieved, and whether forgiveness is possible.

"We must be encouraged to ask questions for which simple answers do not exist. Although human nature may seem to lead us to desire black-and-white answers, we must fight this type of reasoning, for these histories are not simple, they are not about good versus evil. They are complicated and messy."

Paris said she is pleased that members of the Jewish community have reached out to the Aboriginal community, because "genocide, whether physical or cultural grows from the same root with identifiable social pretenses."

She noted that there are similarities between the tactics Nazis used to dehumanize Jews and those that Canadians used to dehumanize First Nations people.

This process, Paris added, was repeated in Rwanda and Bosnia, and the same thing is currently taking place in the Congo and in Sudan.

German woman's path took a different turn

Turned against her father who was a Nazi

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

When Liesel Steffens Appel was born in 1941, in the German town of Klingenberg, her father, Wilhelm, an educator, shouted, "Heil Hitler."

Steffens, an ardent Nazi, thought that his blonde, blue-eyed daughter would be a model Aryan and part of a new, aggressive German generation that would, as Adolf Hitler once ominously said, make the world tremble.

Instead, Appel turned against him and his ideas, left Germany, converted to Judaism and married a Jew. "Fortunately, my destiny took me down a different path," she said last week in Toronto.

A tall, elegant woman with a stately bearing and a dignified manner, she was here for Holocaust Education Week, co-ordinated by the Holocaust Centre of Toronto and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

She talked about her metamorphosis from German to Jew at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, an Orthodox synagogue in the heart of a Jewish neighbourhood. The title of her speech, co-sponsored by Yeshiva University and supported by Emunah Women of Toronto, was A Daughter of Nazi Parents: Personal Reflections.

"It's important for people like me to speak up," she said. "But it's not easy."

Her thoughtful comments made an impression on the fairly large audience. During a question-and-answer session, a man got up from his seat to tell her she is a "true mensch." Another man, a survivor of the Dachau concentration camp, heaped praised on Appel as well.

"Everything about me, my accent and my looks, must be offensive to you, especially since this is the 70th anniversary of Kristallnacht," she said as she launched into her speech.

Appel, who lives in Asheville, N.C., today, told of a formative incident, "my awakening," that left an indelible mark on her.

When she was nine years old and living in the town of Bottrop-Eigen, a stranger informed her that his son had been thrown from a balcony on Kristallnacht in 1938 and was saved by a neighbour.

The stranger was a Jew who had been driven out of Germany by racial persecution. Somehow thinking that the saviour had been her late father, her idol, Appel brought the stranger to her house. After his departure, her mother, Else, was furious. Why had she invited this Jew to their home?

The incident changed Appel, shattering her innocence and making her realize that her parents had been Nazis and anti-Semites, and that her father had been a top official in German-occupied Poland. "My father was a passionate Nazi, but he did not murder anyone, as far as I know."

Eventually, Appel emigrated from Germany, embarking on a journey that brought her to Britain and the United States and that prompted her to adopt a new identity and write her memoirs, The Neighbor's Son (Infinity Publishing).

"I have tried to stand with the Jewish people since I was a child," said Appel, who visited Israel for the first time recently.

Appel, a nursery school teacher by training, converted to Reform Judaism in 1990 in Los Angeles after reading Elie Wiesel's novel Night.

"For me, it was like coming home where I belonged," she said, adding that her father would have been "horrified" had he witnessed her transformation into a Jew.

Appel, who met her Jewish husband after her conversion, maintains that her story is not unique. "There are many others like me, though I haven't connected with them."

In comments after her speech, she said she is alienated from Germany. As she put it, "I would never feel comfortable in Germany again."

Some Germans, she acknowledged, have condemned her as a person who has fouled her own nest. But in Toronto last week, Appel was seen as a courageous woman who has spent a lifetime coming to terms with Germany's Nazi legacy.

First Nations compared to Jews of Spain

She talked about the dangers of assimilation policies such as the one that put First Nations children in residential schools, where they suffered abuse at the hands of their educators who thought of them as "savages" and tried to rid them of any aboriginal culture.

"The physical and psychological abuse that became an integral part of the residential school culture resulted inevitably from the repeated devaluing of their people," Paris said.

"Because they were considered inferior by definition, 'uncivilized un-Christian savages,' the children were vulnerable to predation. They were powerless, as were their parents."

Like the convert Jews of Spain and the convert Jews of Germany, she said that Canada's First Nations were deprived of their historic identity.

"When they returned to their communities, they were neither fish nor fowl. They weren't Indian by culture, but they were not members of the 'civilized white elite' either."

She said the effects of this are still being felt by First Nations today, but the Indian Residential Schools Truth and Reconciliation Commission – which was established earlier this year to document the testimonies of those affected by the schools and to inform all Canadians about what transpired – can be useful in the aftermath of such human rights abuses, as long as it has a "broad and inclusive mandate.

"It must be a two-way street. It is critically important for the survivors of government-sponsored abuses to tell their stories in the public forum, for these statements will become the back-bone of an authentic historical record of a shameful era, which otherwise, might be deliberately ignored."

Fontaine, who spent 10 years in residential schools as a child, is the leading voice of Canada's First Nations. He has been leading the charge to implement the Indian Residential Schools Settlement Agreement, which is worth more than $5.2 billion, and is the largest, most unique and comprehensive settlement in Canadian history.

Fontaine said that when Prime Minister Stephen Harper officially apologized last June in the House of Commons to Canada's First Nations for their suffering in residential schools, it was a victory for his people, but he was struck by the fact that a majority of Canadians were unaware that residential schools even existed.

"If most Canadians are not aware of this experience, this experience that represents one of the saddest, darkest chapters in Canadian history, what should we expect from Canadians about the issues of today?" asked Fontaine, who spoke of visiting Israel with Canadian Jewish Congress in 2006 and gaining a better understanding of the Jewish struggle for emancipation and Jews' effort to reclaim their homeland, which is something his people can relate to.

"We shouldn't be as we are, marginalized, disadvantaged, and the most impoverished segment of Canadian society. That we should have such poverty in the midst of such incredible wealth is simply unexplainable in our minds… It represents an onerous burden, not just for the people that live the experience, but the entire country," Fontaine said.

He said that the most critical issues plaguing Canada's First Nations are housing, access to safe drinking water, and inadequate schools and hospitals.

He said First Nations people also have the highest suicide rate among 16- to 24-year-olds in the world, because their situation seems so hopeless.

"Why should we be treated so unfairly? No one can tell us in a straightforward way that we deserve to be treated this way," Fontaine said. "We have to fight for everything… Inch by inch, we fight. There is nothing that is handed to us. Nothing."

He said that the Truth and Reconciliation Commission is necessary for the stories of those who were victimized to be told.

"We are going to write the history, this missing chapter."

A prisoner of his own shattering memories

By RON CSILLAG
Special to The CJN

Holocaust Education Week came to an end last Sunday night in jarring and dramatic fashion: through the eyes, ears and tortured memory of one of its "victims."

A full house at the Toronto Centre for the Arts came not for another lecture or talk but a unique and haunting 50-minute set piece that combined bravura acting from Canadian Saul Rubinek and disquieting music from an eight-piece ensemble.

Through Roses, described as a "ritual of music and words," portrays the tormented flashbacks of Carl Stern, a Jewish violinist and Holocaust survivor who was forced to perform for the Nazis at Auschwitz – watching, as others, including his wife, were marched to their deaths. Now, as he grapples with his horrible past, Stern, addled and alone, clad in the striped pajamas of the death camp inmate and a tuxedo jacket, becomes a prisoner of his own shattering memories.

Written and composed by Marc Neikrug, both of whose parents were cellists, the eerie score drops references to Beethoven, Haydn, Mozart, Wagner and others. One critic described it "a collage of 200 years of music culture." It's been performed around the world in a dozen languages and was made into a film starring Maximilian Schell.

Neikrug, the longtime recital partner of Pinchas Zukerman, music director of the National Arts Centre Orchestra in Ottawa, got the idea for the piece when he heard that cellist Anita Lasker-Wallfisch, a member of the orchestra at the time, had been imprisoned in Auschwitz as a teenager and was forced to perform as part of a prisoner orchestra, giving concerts for guards and prisoners. He spent months interviewing musician survivors, including Lasker-Wallfisch, and talked to psychiatrists about trauma and survivor guilt.

Saul Rubinek

The result is an unsettling exploration of memory and trauma. Reality is blurred. The violinist is tortured by dreams and illusion. The louder and more atonal the music gets, the more awful his memories.

The horrible irony is that Stern was destined for greatness and it was his talent that kept him alive at Auschwitz. His role was to play music mornings and evenings for the work details leaving and arriving back to camp, and to give "concerts" for the commandants and their families.

He recounts how old men were forced to dance until they collapsed. It was his playing that accompanied the march of women and children to their deaths in the gas chambers. The terrible climax comes when one day Stern spies his wife, whom he thought was in Paris, being herded to the gas chambers, beaten in front of the place where he was still alive playing.

He witnesses all this through a rose bush in the garden of the commandant, who lived just beyond the camp's perimeter in a nice house with his wife and two children. The house was so close to the crematoria that the shadows of the chimneys fell on the lawn on sunny days. The rose bush is maintained by the commandant's wife as though nothing is happening a few metres away. This forms the backdrop of the nightmare that is Through Roses.

In the semi-darkness of the end, Stern himself joins the ensemble. The audience is left to wonder what this means; indeed, after the lights go out, audiences everywhere have sat in uneasy silence for a few moments, wondering whether the piece has ended, and to applaud.

Ottawa native Rubinek, star of stage, screen and television, was born in a displaced persons' camp in Germany in 1948. His parents Israel and Frania were hidden by a Polish farm family for more than two years, a story the actor has told in So Many Miracles, a book and film he produced in the late 1980s about their experiences.

The close of Holocaust Education Week coincided with the 70th anniversary of Kristallnacht, the night on which murderous Nazi thugs roamed Germany and Austria smashing Jewish business, homes and synagogues, and marking the beginning of the end of European Jewry.

'Must always keep in mind what Hitler did to the Jews'

"You and I and the world must always keep in mind what Hitler did to the Jews," he said, noting that "never again became again and again… We continue to have much to learn."

Kilgour offered three lessons: first, he said, "we need to stand united against hatred and indifference. Had all of us stood together shoulder to shoulder when anyone was being persecuted, many innocent people would have been saved."

Second, he added, "we need to act early… Anti-Semitism tends to increase as certain kinds of nationalism grow." He urged all faith groups to speak out, for "an attack on one faith community is an attack on all."

His third lesson was that "the international community must condemn aggression by totalitarian regimes against another country or religion." He specifically urged the world to take seriously the threats of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad to "wipe Israel off the map."

He also, however, urged restraint in dealing with Iran. "I hasten to say that an attack against Iran is the one thing that would unite Iranians with their president and should be avoided at all costs."

Holocaust survivor George Kadar thanked Kilgour, and told his own story of survival, acknowledging the various people along his journey who enabled him to finally find a safe and productive life in Canada. "I express my gratitude to Canada, the greatest country in the world," he said.

A dvar Torah was given by Rabbi Howard Finkelstein of Congregation Beit Tikvah of Ottawa.

"Thank God for Canada, thank God for our ability to live in a democratic country, thank God for our ability to stand up for our rights and the rights of all people around the world," he said.

Memorial candles were lit by six Holocaust survivors: Truda Rosenberg, Vera Kovesi, Anna Heilman, David Moskovic, Barry Davis and George Gara.

K'El Maleh Rachamim was chanted by Cantor Moshe Kraus, himself a survivor who then led those assembled in reciting the Kaddish together.

The ceremony was organized in collaboration with the Shoah (Holocaust) committee of the Jewish Federation of Ottawa as part of Holocaust Education Week.

Protecting business interests on separation

Family Matters
by
John Syrtash
B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Counsel
Garfin Zeidenberg LLP
Family Lawyer & Mediator for 26 years

Question: I have spent many years building up my business. I suspect that on separation I will have to split everything 50-50 with my wife, but I think that is completely unfair. Is there anything I can do to protect my interest in my business, if we were to go our separate ways?

Answer: Without careful planning, you may have a serious problem. But be aware of how your business interest is regarded in Ontario Family Law. Your business interest will be valuated as of the date you separated. It will then form part of your total "net worth" (called "net family property"). If the value of your wife's net worth is less than yours on the date you separate then you will pay her half the difference between your net worth positions. However, in doing so you don't include the value of her net worth (net family property) on the date you got married. The value of your "net worth" on the date of marriage is deducted from your total net worth on the date of separation. If on the date of marriage you had $100,000 in assets and $30,000 in debts, than you deduct $70,000 from your "net worth" as of the date of separation.

The general philosophy is that you only have to share with your wife the "increase" in your net worth from the date of marriage until the date of separation. So, if you owned the business on the date you got married, then it is only its increase in value that you may have to share with your wife, if you separated right away. However, business people, particularly those close to retirement, wind down their business over a reasonable period of time well before the separation date so that the value of their business by the date of separation is considerably less that it might have been ordinarily. Others carefully increase the fixed debtload of their operations for legitimate business reasons over a reasonable period of time, also well before the separation date. Such action "decreases" the asset's equity over time before it is valued on the date of separation.

As long as one can demonstrate sound business reasons for the expansion a court may find it difficult to find that the deal was contrived, particularly if one has partners who insist upon spending the money in order to make more money. However, pre-planning for a separation to protect your business interests can be a suspicious tactic. It should not be done without sound legal and accounting advice.

Rabbi's book collection donated to York University

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The thousands of books Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut consulted over the decades for his sermons, essays, articles and books, have been donated to York University.

Friends and family gathered at York on Nov. 2 to recognize the gift of Rabbi Plaut's library that consists of more than 4,000 books, some of which are very rare and centuries old, said Sara Horowitz, director of York's Centre for Jewish Studies.

The books in the Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut and Elizabeth S. Plaut Library, which is in the Clara Thomas Archives and Special Collections section of the York library, have been shelved in the same way as Rabbi Plaut had them arranged when they were in his possession.

"Rather than simply being merged into the library of congress system, the books are grouped the way he grouped them, which is an interesting way of understanding how his thinking developed, because in addition to being a rabbi at Holy Blossom Temple, he was also one of the foremost thinkers and theologians of the Reform movement of the 20th century, not only in Canada but internationally," Horowitz said.

Horowitz said this acquisition is significant because it also gives York's Centre for Jewish Studies the copyrights to Plaut's published works.

"It means we can develop Jewish intellectual projects that might have Rabbi Plaut's writing at the centre. In the future, we might decide to take a particular essay or a sermon of his, or something he published on any given issue that might have wide-reaching implications, and we could use his essay as a jumping-off point," Horowitz said.

Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut, centre, pictured with his daughter Judith Plaut and his son Rabbi Jonathan Plaut, donated his extensive library to York University.

Rabbi Plaut, who was born in Germany, fled to the United States from the Nazi regime in 1935, and was later ordained as a rabbi by the Hebrew Union College. He served in World War II as a chaplain and was present when the first American troops entered a concentration camp in Germany.

Among other designations, Rabbi Plaut, 96, served as Canadian Jewish Congress president. He also helped found Toronto's Urban Alliance for Race Relations and served as the Ontario Human Rights Commission vice-chair.

For more than 20 years, Rabbi Plaut was a columnist for The CJN and a contributor of opinion pieces to the Toronto Star.

In 2003, Rabbi Plaut announced, by way of his last column in The CJN, that he had been diagnosed with Alzheimer's disease, and since then, he has largely removed himself from public activities.

Horowitz said that Rabbi Plaut, who has published 26 books on theology, philosophy, history and even fiction, had spoken with his family years in advance about donating his collection to York.

"I think the groundwork, the seeds for this, were laid much earlier by Rabbi Plaut himself when this was something that was projected well into the future."

She guessed that Rabbi Plaut chose York over another institution with a Jewish studies centre because of his relationship with the school and the members of the faculty.

"I know that he had a relationship with the first director of the Centre for Jewish Studies, Sydney Eisen, and I believe he had one with Michael Brown [another of the centre's directors], and so I think [because of] these relationships and the way that the Centre for Jewish Studies and the Jewish studies program developed at York, he felt this would be an appropriate place to have this collection."

The rabbi's eclectic library consists of works on religion, science, ethics, politics and history, as well as art, popular fiction and cartoons.

"Among other things, it includes rare books of Judaica, books of biblical commentary on Halachah, books by really important Jewish thinkers that are, the books themselves, several centuries old, and they are quite rare. These are books that you would very infrequently encounter," Horowitz said.

"To just see them and be able to touch them and look at their pages is really exciting."

She added that the books will be kept in a controlled environment among the library's special collections. Students and faculty will be able to consult the books, but they would have to remain in the controlled environment of the special collections reading room to preserve the books.

She said she was struck by how far-reaching Rabbi Plaut's influence is.

"Many people at York University, who are not in Jewish studies per se, have approached me in the last month or two since this has become public, and have said, 'Oh, Rabbi Plaut, he was so important in my life. He officiated my wedding. I remember this sermon, and that sermon,'" she said.

"His theological thinking, both his way of applying modern methodologies to Jewish texts and his way of applying Jewish sources to modern issues is really significant for anyone who wants to study not only the development of Reform Judaism, but religion as a field altogether."

Western grad pitches kosher baby food on Dragon's Den

By AMY SOBERANO
Special to The CJN

Twenty-three-year-old Lorne Morein, got more than love from his eastern European grandmother.

He also got the recipe for what he hopes will be a new line of fleishig baby food.

In what began as a business school project, Morein and five fellow students, used his grandmother's recipe to develop a line of frozen kosher meat baby food to fill what they see as a gaping void in the Canadian market, which has no such locally made option.

They've dubbed their new product "Bubbie's Best Kosher Baby Food."

And, prompted by positive feedback from their professors at the University of Western Ontario's Richard Ivey School of business, three of the original group members – Morein, Mark Rutledge and Taneem Khan – went on to pitch their product on the CBC reality television show Dragon's Den.

The program features aspiring entrepreneurs making proposals to a panel of wealthy investors in the hope of receiving the financial support necessary to bring their ideas to market.

The recipe they used belongs to Morein's grandmother.

"She was thrilled and flattered that we used her recipe," said Morein. "She made it for me when I was a baby."

Lorne Morein

Morein, a native of Toronto, enrolled at Western as a philosophy major. Although raised in a family of entrepreneurs, he was driven to pursue his interest in the arts.

"I really enjoyed philosophy," Morein said. "It taught me a lot about how to think and helped me to work on my analytical skills."

But Morein also took several business courses, which led him to apply to the university's renowned business school in his third year of undergraduate studies. After completing a degree in philosophy, Morein began a two-year intensive business program.

"The education we got in Ivey gave us a little more confidence to go forward with something like this [development of a product line]," Morein said.

"We had the necessary toolkit and skills to evaluate a new venture. It gave me a different approach."

Morein graduated from UWO last April, but the classroom project was far from complete. Morein spent a large portion of his final two semesters developing the business plan for the kosher baby food that he and his group eventually presented to a panel of professors.

"We started to notice that supermarket chains were expanding to have more ethnic foods," explained Morein of the inspiration for the product.

While many stores were beginning to include kosher sections, Morein and his team discovered that Canadian stores didn't sell any kosher meat products for babies. Further research in pediatric nutrition revealed that that such protein is considered beneficial to a child's development.

The students surveyed 200 Jewish parents who keep kosher to find out how they were feeding their babies. They learned that half the parents surveyed make their own meat-based baby food – a long and arduous process – while the other half simply didn't introduce meat into their children's diets until later.

"That's where we saw the opportunity," Morein said. "The Canadian market is under-serviced."

And as it happened, the same week that Morein's group presented the final product to their professors, the Dragon's Den producers were holding auditions at Western.

"We got extremely positive feedback from the professors," Morein said. "They really encouraged us to consider taking it to the next level. We decided to give it a shot."

A few weeks later, Morein, who was celebrating his recent graduation by backpacking through Europe, received the news that his group had been accepted into the show's next stage of screening. He flew home early to have his project scrutinized by another round of business professionals.

"At first it was difficult to explain the concept of kosher to non-Jewish people. It seemed to them like a very small market," Morein said of the challenges the group faced.

Fortunately, the recent graduates were prepared. Their research revealed that the market was far greater than it seemed to be at first glance. In addition to babies, the food would also be beneficial for elderly Jewish people who required softer food.

As well, the product might also be attractive to Muslims, since the stricter requirements of kashrut would make the product halal (the Muslim version of kosher) by default.

Although Morein and his team ultimately didn't receive funding from the reality series panel, the experience gave them invaluable insight into the complexities of launching a business.

"At the end of the day, [the Dragon's Den panel] gave us some really great advice as to where we can take the company," said Morein of his experience on the show.

"My biggest take-away is that it's not just about getting money from anyone, but rather from someone who has experience and connections in your line of business."

Morein now works in the commercial banking department of TD Bank, but he hasn't given up on Bubbie's Best Kosher Baby Food.

"We're still interested in pursuing the idea with other investors. I definitely see some stint of entrepreneurship in my future."

Teacher finishes marathon after breast surgery

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Brenda Baskind has been a long-distance runner for some time. When she first took up the sport nine years ago, she thought it would help her stay fit and lose weight.

Unfortunately, running didn't prove to be a magic bullet. While training for last month's Toronto Marathon, Baskind learned the breast cancer for which she had been treated seven years before had recurred and would require a mastectomy.

Undaunted, the day before her surgery Baskind joined her husband for a 16-kilometre run. More remarkably, six weeks after her breast and lymph nodes were removed, Baskind was back at it big time, running in her seventh Toronto Marathon.

Baskind, 64, not only finished the 42-kilometre race, she felt great doing so. She ran the course in a personal best time of four hours and 57 minutes. Her previous best was five hours and 11 minutes.

"I was hoping to complete the marathon. That would have been good enough for me. But it was like the wind beneath my wings. I was so happy just to be out there," she said.

"When I was running, I felt fantastic and I went faster than I ever did before."

Originally from South Africa, Baskind was one of only four runners in her age group of 60- to 64-year-olds. Sixty-three at the time of the run, "I was the oldest and I came in third in my group."

Brenda Baskind

A nursery school teacher at Holy Blossom Temple, Baskind runs only one marathon a year. "I'm not such a youngster," she quipped.

She came to running rather late in life, beginning at age 55. Her first diagnosis of breast cancer came not long afterward.

"When I got breast cancer the first time, it was a bit of a shock," she said. She had been losing weight and feeling good.

But the diagnosis was "scary," and treatment consisted of radiation therapy and a lumpectomy. Her oncologist, also a runner, advised she could continue to run. All through her 25 days of treatment she did so, because, "running made me feel great."

Marathons took it to another level: "There's no greater feeling than finishing a marathon," she said.

In past years, she and her husband, Colin, prepared for the Toronto Marathon by training at the Running Room.

This time, they did all the training themselves. "It's a 20-week schedule," Brenda said.

The intense training regimen was interrupted in September by the surgery. Her doctor cautioned her to avoid running for four weeks afterward, but once that period was up, she was back pounding the pavement.

"I wasn't sure if I could run 42 kilometres," she said, but about 10 days before the race she completed a long run of 30 kilometres. "My husband said, 'I think you can do it.'"

After that, "I rested. I was fresh and I felt great," she said.

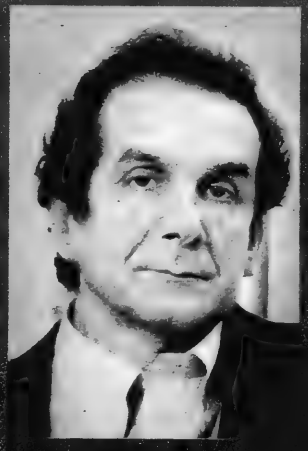
Colin believes Brenda's story is inspirational.

"For people with a similar illness, there's a way around it," even while "beating one's best time after surgery," he said.

THE GERALD SCHWARTZ/HEATHER REISMAN
FALL 2008 LECTURE SERIES AT HOLY BLOSSOM TEMPLE

Telling the Zionist Story Anew
Israel Explains Itself to the World

When much of the world de-legitimizes Zionism and the State of Israel — now more than ever — Jews and our friends are required to tell the story of the Jewish State; to tell of its history and values; to tell of the dignity Zionism imbued in the Jewish People; to tell of the progressive nature of the State of Israel and the Zionist Movement that brought everything about. Please join us for the last lecture in our four-speaker series.



Charles Krauthammer

Wed. Nov. 19, at 8 p.m.

Introduction: Robert Lantos

Charles Krauthammer is a columnist for the Washington Post and winner of the Pulitzer Prize for Distinguished Commentary.

HOLY BLOSSOM TEMPLE
ק"ק פחי קדש

1950 Bathurst Street
Toronto, ON M5P 3K9
www.holyblossom.org

Doors open at 7 p.m. for Holy Blossom Temple members and Friends of Holy Blossom Temple with Advance Seating Cards, and at 7:30 p.m. for members of the greater community. Admission is free.

DISNEY DRESSUP: Grade 1 students, from left, Dylan Sager, Noah Weinberg, Levi Tilis, and Tali Rovet had a great time on Disney Dress-up Day at United Synagogue Day School's Beth Tikvah campus recently.

SPECIAL DAY: Noah Wolanski, who was born with myatonic dystrophy, a regressive genetic disorder, was called to the Torah as a bar mitzvah at Reena's Toby and Henry Battle Developmental Centre in late August at a service conducted by Rabbi Mendel Bernstein, spiritual leader of Chabad Lubavitch of Richmond Hill. Noah – who is developmentally delayed and whose prognosis when he was diagnosed was that he would not walk or talk – began walking at age three and talking at age five. He prepared for his bar mitzvah for one year and read from the Torah without prompting. Noah is the son of Rena and Mark Wolanski, brother of Rebecca, grandson of Sandy Keshen, president and CEO of Reena, and of Leon and Esther Wolanski. [Barry Shainbaum photo]

Obama not likely to be strongly pro-Israel, says David Frum

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Barack Obama may not be the most favourable U.S. president for Israel, according to conservative political commentator and writer David Frum.

The U.S. president-elect has neither the emotional connection to Israel and the Jewish people nor the strong conviction of Israel's strategic importance that other presidents have had throughout the state's history, Frum said in Montreal the day after the U.S. election.

David Frum

What's more, Frum surmises that Obama will have to move to the political centre on domestic issues because his support comes from both the "top and bottom of U.S. society." According to Frum's reasoning, he will, therefore, have to satisfy the left in the area of foreign policy.

"And the one sure lever he has to do that is to put pressure on Israel to make concessions to the Palestinians," said Frum who gave the keynote lecture of Jewish Book Month, sponsored by the Jewish Public Library.

Getting tough on Israel will also enhance U.S. popularity in much of the rest of the world, which is one of the hopes many Americans have for the new administration, he said.

At the same time, Israel is entering what Frum believes will be a time of political vulnerability.

Having said that, Frum declared he is "not afraid of Obama or the Obama administration" as far as Israel is concerned, adding that many of the fears about the man are the result of Obama's obscurity until relatively recently.

What reassures Frum is Obama's "patience and caution in making decisions. If he makes a bad decision, it won't be a hasty one."

Frum also has confidence in the "decency and moderation of the American people."

Frum, a Toronto native based in Washington, D.C., was a speechwriter for President George W. Bush during 2001 and 2002, and was a foreign policy adviser to former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani during Giuliani's short-lived bid for this year's Republican presidential nomination.

Frum also said he is certain Obama will not take military action against Iran, but he is not disappointed by that, because he thinks that Iran's attaining nuclear capability does not spell doomsday. He believes Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's days are numbered and that he will be ousted by June.

"I think it's a big mistake to get too worked up over Ahmadinejad. The real holders of power in Iran realize he is a liability, and he has become a pariah."

The next president, Frum forecast, will be an unknown and much less provocative.

A nuclear Iran is almost inevitable, according to Frum, and "we are on our way to living with it."

He does not believe Iran would strike Israel because as, certain studies have shown, the worst-case scenario of a nuclear conflict would kill 300,000 Israelis, but also 50 million Iranians and "obliterate Iranian civilization."

This is due to Israel's military superiority, but also the mountainous terrain of Iran which would allow nuclear missiles to ricochet and multiply their force, said Frum.

Iran would more likely use nuclear weapons against U.S forces if they disrupted oil lines in the Persian Gulf, he said.

Despite what Obama said during the campaign, Frum does not believe Obama will veer toward protectionism and renegotiate the North American Free Trade Agreement.

But Canada should worry about Obama's imposing tariffs on imports of "dirty" energy, Frum said, which could include oil from the Alberta tar sands.

To discourage outsourcing, Obama might also may also require American corporations which enjoy a lower tax rate in other countries, including Canada, to pay that difference to the U.S. government, he added.

Frum attributed the Republicans' downfall not only to the Iraq war quagmire and the mishandling of the Hurricane Katrina disaster, but to its failure to act when there were clear signs of an economic crisis by the summer of 2007.

The party stuck to economic polices from the 1970s and '80s, which he said were no longer relevant.

Republican presidential candidate John McCain had "no policy agenda whatsoever," and failed to distinguish himself from an unpopular administration, Frum continued.

McCain instead "ran on his biography, which is all right as long as you are ahead, but once you fall behind, you have to explain what is wrong with the other guy's biography," and that meant going negative.

"The election was not a referendum on Iraq, an issue on which Americans had more faith in McCain," but was about the economy, and consequently he lost, Frum said.

As for his pick for running mate, Alaska Gov. Sarah Palin, Frum said McCain wanted independent Democrat Joe Lieberman "in his heart," and former Pennsylvania governor Tom Ridge "in his head." But Lieberman's partisan ambiguity and Ridge's pro-choice stance on abortion ruled them out.

The obvious choice was runner-up Mitt Romney, who is pro-life, but after Obama defeated Hillary Clinton, the Republic brass wanted a woman, and there were only five pro-life female senators or governors, Frum said.

"McCain was stubborn, but at the last minute he crumbled and said OK."

Despite the impression she was a liability for McCain, Frum said Palin is "one of the three or four front-runners" for the 2012 Republican presidential nomination.

"She has ignited a level of enthusiasm among Republicans that has not been seen for a long time," he said.

HELPING SICK KIDS

Zachary Winkler, seen with Thornhill MP Peter Kent, raised $1,720 for the Hospital for Sick Children at his second annual "Do Something Sweet" event on Nov. 2. The seven-year-old Associated Hebrew Schools student gave out candy floss in front of his home and asked people to donate money for the hospital. This year's fund-raiser was held in memory of Zachary's grandfather, Charles Zaionz.

Uncertainty of Quebec election causing community unease

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Having enjoyed 20 months of relative political, if not social, calm in Quebec, the Jewish community is gradually awakening to the possibility that it could end soon.

Most people were too preoccupied dissecting the historic vote south of the border to pay much attention when Premier Jean Charest called an election for Dec. 8 the following day.

The outcome is by no means certain. The Liberals were reduced to a minority in the last election in March 2007, and Charest is gambling that the time is right – or at least will never be better – to regain a majority.

With the official opposition, the Action Démocratique du Québec's (ADQ), in disarray, the question is which way its disaffected supporters will go. New Parti Québécois (PQ) leader Pauline Marois has said she would not hold a sovereignt referendum in her first mandate, which may make soft nationalists or those on the left less reluctant to back the party.

The PQ is trying to profit from the "Obama effect," offering itself as the agent of change.

There is also concern that there could be a backlash against the Liberals for holding an election few are said to want.

While the Liberals, and Charest personally, have enjoyed a resurgence in popularity, after being written off, as any observer knows, predictions in Quebec politics are risky. Things can turn around very dramatically, even in a 33-day campaign.

Charest's theme is that Quebec will be in a better position to tackle the global economic crisis if his government does not have to share power with two other parties. At dissolution, Liberals held 48 seats in the National Assembly, the ADQ 39, the PQ 36 and two seats were vacant.

The community breathed a sign of relief when the ADQ, under leader Mario Dumont, became the No. 2 party in the last election, because that relegated the PQ to third-party status for the first time since 1973 and took separatism off the front burner.

Jews will continue to give overwhelming support to the Liberals. The ADQ has made no inroads into the community, and the perception is that Dumont tried to capitalize on anti-immigrant and anti-minority feeling, helping to precipitate an overheated debate on the reasonable accommodation of minorities in the province.

His recent resurrection of "autonomy," a vague concept somewhere between sovereignty and federalism, has also won him few friends in the Jewish community.

Turnout may be an issue. Many older members of the Jewish community have headed south by Dec. 8, and even by the time of the advance polls. Among those living in D'Arcy McGee, the riding with the largest Jewish population and one of the highest proportion of seniors, a certain complacency may have set in that Liberal incumbent Lawrence Bergman's re-election is as sure as day follows night.

He garnered 84 per cent of the vote in 2007, the highest in the province, although down from the more than 90 per cent he once enjoyed.

Bergman, first elected in 1994, is seeking his fifth mandate. He and the organized Jewish community were very disappointed that he wasn't re-appointed to cabinet after serving as revenue minister in Charest's first government. Liberal governments have appointed a Jew to the cabinet since 1970, and even Bernard Landry's PQ government briefly had a Jewish cabinet member.

A second Jewish MNA, Liberal Russell Copeman of Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, resigned last month after 14 years in office.

Bergman said the election is necessary in these troubled economic times, because "the two opposition parties were systematically obstructing us in the National Assembly… In a difficult economy it takes one person's hands on the wheel, not three pairs of hands.

"We have a better leader, better team, better program and much more experience in our caucus… Quebec is in the good position it is because of the policies we put in place 18 months ago: cuts in income tax and billions of dollars of investment in infrastructure and energy programs, like the windmill project. This is creating jobs."

Snowboarding rabbi sets up outpost

By LAUREN KRAMER
Pacific Correspondent

WHISTLER, B.C. — He goes by the nickname the Snowboarding Rabbi, but Chaim Shapiro, 27, says he's been too busy trying to create Jewish programming in the alpine resort town of Whistler, B.C., to get in much time on the slopes over the past year-and-a-half.

The New York City native and Chabad emissary moved to British Columbia two years ago after marrying Vancouverite Leah Feigelstock, and the two were keen to create a vibrant Jewish centre in Whistler, two hours' drive from their home in Vancouver.

"We decided it would be a unique and challenging experience," said Rabbi Shapiro, who knows of 60 Jewish families that live in town full time and is in active contact with 30 of them.

Rabbi Chaim Shapiro with his wife Leah

But those numbers are bolstered significantly by his conservative estimate that up to 70,000 Jewish tourists descend on Whistler each year.

Rabbi Shapiro has organized après-ski prayers when a minyan was needed for someone to recite Kaddish, as well as Shabbatons, a mobile sukkah on the back of a truck, Chanukah parties and Rosh Hashanah services.

Last Chanukah, after the Municipality of Whistler declared that no public religious displays were allowed, he persuaded some 25 hotels and stores to display chanukiyot in their windows.

He also helped arrange for local grocery stores to start carrying Shabbat candles, challot and kosher food, and today you can even buy kosher wine at the local liquor store.

Rabbi Shapiro makes the two-hour commute to Whistler every week in winter, renting an apartment or staying at a hotel. His dream, however, is to buy a sizable house where he can host Jewish visitors, hold services and serve meals, and where he, Leah and their two children could also live.

He has a team helping him fundraise for the $2.3 million needed to make the dream a reality.

"There is such diversity in the Jewish people you can reach in Whistler," he said.

"I wanted to try and use my snowboarding skills as a tool to reach some of those people – Whistler residents, staff and tourists. I believe Whistler is a place that speaks to Jewish people from all walks of life, and if you set up Jewish programming, they will come," he added.

"The timing is great, because the whole world is talking about the Whistler Olympics [in 2010]. Our plan is to make Whistler a place where the Jewish world will come, too."

Rabbi Shapiro is currently hard at work organizing a series of Shabbatons for the busy winter weekends. He also has Chanukah firmly on his radar, with a snow sculpture chanukiyah on Whistler Mountain and a live Jewish concert in the pipeline.

חדשה בקנדה

נינה שנהב

"רשמתי לך הודעות." מכריז דבן שלי, ומגיש לי פיסת נייר רבה רשימים שנראים האנשים שהתקשרו, כשלא הייתי בבית. אני קוראת את ההודעות, ומשום מה מרגישה עצבנית קלה.

"הבחבל מי התקשר." אני אומרת לבאיר, בעלי. "תראה: גלעד וחנה, מודיע, סיגל ועודד. מה לא בסדר בקבוצה הזו?"

"כשתומי, דבן שלי, קיבל הזמנה לימ ההולדת של סטיב, החלטתי להצטרף." אני אומרת מחיוך מבוישת (באנגלית). "בכל זאת, יום ההולדת הראשון שהבן שלי הולך אליו. רציתי שלא יהיה בודד." אני מכבירה לאחת הסבתות, שמכניסה בי בקפטריות רבה.

"יבמה את עסקית?" שואל האב (מפשירים, תרחה לאל). "אני עיתונאית. עבכתי עיתונים בישראל. הייתי מה שנקרא 'האט שאט', חצי סלברטי אפילו. אה, התבוטת פה? פה אני מבצלת. אין! פרטי. איזו השקעה. אני הולכת להביא לבי כמה ילדים. אל תלך לשום מקום!" אני מזהירה אותו בחיוך שובב.

"טוב," אני אומרת כשאמתי נפרדים בדלת, "שוב תודה. כל כך חשוב לבי להיות בקשר חברי עם ילדי קבדה. אז יום חמישי דבא אצלינו?"

"בשמחה." אומר האב ומצחקק. "אגב, אמתי לא ילדי קבדה. באמי, שתי המשפחות, של אישתי ושלי, מאירלנד. אז יום חמישי בשבוע?" אני בולעת חיק ודחפת את הבן שלי לעבר הריצאה. "אתם יודעים מה, עוד נדבר. יפל להיות שנהיה עסקים בדיוק."

ותצפנים שאלה. בכלל לא קבדים...

Jewish groups welcome declaration of Quebec values

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Both Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and B'nai Brith Canada have welcomed the Quebec government's new policy of requiring prospective immigrants to sign a declaration of values said to be common to all Quebecers.

CJC Quebec region president Victor Goldbloom's only reservation is that the contract will be little more than symbolic, and likely could not be enforced legally if signatories don't respect these values, short of breaking the law.

Victor Goldbloom

Among the key points of the declaration are that Quebec is a democratic and pluralistic society, that men and women have equal rights, and that political and religious institutions are separate. It also states that the province is governed by the Charter of the French Language, and that French is not only the official language, it's also the common language of work, teaching, communication and business.

Goldbloom said he believes it's important that people who choose to live in Quebec be aware of the province's particular traditions and culture, and that it's reasonable that they be expected to commit themselves formally to sharing in its fundamental values.

The declaration will be an important educational tool in making clear to immigrants what is required to be part of this society, he said.

"On the other hand, very few people are going to say no [to signing] and thereby give up the opportunity to become a Canadian citizen." There is no way of judging how sincere the signatories are.

Goldbloom said he doesn't think that forcing people to sign on to concepts that aren't part of their culture, such as the equality of men and women, infringes in any way on their freedom of thought.

"Certain religious groups, including my own, are not perfect on the issue of gender equality. I recognize that, and this is not a problem as long as members of that group do not feel abused by it. But our laws are clear, and if a woman from such a group objects to being in a secondary position, she must have access to the human rights bodies or the courts to contest that."

Last year, in a presentation to the parliamentary committee planning the province's immigration policy, CJC and Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS), in fact, recommended that immigrants be obliged to sign a "moral contract" that they will abide by the province's "common values." Goldbloom was then also the Montreal president of JIAS.

The organizations said in their brief that such a requirement would send a signal that "the foundations of our society are not negotiable."

Similarly, B'nai Brith praised the declaration's educational value in integrating immigrants.

"Newcomers should understand that Quebec has a rich heritage that welcomes people of diverse ethnicities and backgrounds whose responsibility it must be to respect and uphold the province's democratic values and human rights," Allan Adel, national chair of the organization's League for Human Rights, said in a statement.

"B'nai Brith has long called for a vigorous educational program for new immigrants who often import their hatreds and prejudices into Canada, especially when coming from countries with no entrenched democratic traditions."

Bring a Friend to Shul Day held in Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Synagogues representing the three major denominations of Judaism participated in Winnipeg's first-ever Bring a Friend to Shul Day.

"It was nice to see the different denominations working together on this initiative," said Rabbi Ari Ellis, who was recently appointed as spiritual leader of Herzlia Adas-Yeshurun Synagogue in south Winnipeg, the city's largest Orthodox congregation.

The Nov. 1 initiative arose out of a meeting earlier this year of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg, its major beneficiary organizations and the four main Winnipeg synagogues.

"We were looking for strategies to encourage more members of the community to engage themselves in Jewish activities," said Faye Rosenberg-Cohen, the federation's planning director. "This seemed like an idea that would be quick and easy to implement.

Ian Staniloff, executive director of the south Winnipeg Shaarey Zedek Synagogue, Winnipeg's largest and oldest congregation, is supportive of the Bring a Friend to Shul concept because "it allows us to introduce our shul and our clergy to people who would not normally attend.

"We had 30 to 40 more people [than usual]. However, we also had a special family Shabbat program that day, so some of those additional people may have come for the latter."

Rabbi Larry Lander, spiritual leader of the north Winnipeg Congregation Etz Chayim, an egalitarian Conservative shul and the community's second-largest congregation, said he heard from some members that they were bringing friends, but he wasn't sure how many actually did.

"On a regular Shabbat, we usually get up to 200 people," he said. "We are a lively congregation," and it's difficult to say how many guests were there.

Rabbi Lander said every Shabbat should be Bring a Friend to Shul Day.

Herzlia Adas-Yeshurun's Rabbi Ellis felt there were more people in shul than usual, but congregants were given an added incentive.

"We used the occasion as a reason to host a special Shabbat lunch after services, with lox and bagel and other stuff," he said.

The fourth congregation participating in Bring a Friend to Shul Day was the Reform Temple Shalom.

Daily Show staffers aren't interested in journalistic integrity, just comedy

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Just days before one of the most closely watched, exciting American presidential election in recent U.S. history, David Javerbaum and Steve Bodow, staffers on The Daily Show with Jon Stewart, were in Toronto to talk about a show that has changed the way people watch the news.

The Daily Show is a politically satirical comedy program that attempts to cut through the spin offered by the 24-hour news networks, with fake news reports, humorous commentary, field pieces and in-studio interviews.

But Javerbaum, the executive producer, and Bodow, the head writer of the Emmy Award-winning show, both reject the idea that it should be viewed as a news source.

"Even if we were interested in applying the journalistic rules of fairness and integrity... it would not apply to us, because we're a comedy show," said Javerbaum, who shared the stage with Bodow at the Fairmont Royal York Hotel on Oct. 30, for a UJA Federation of Greater Toronto benefit.

Also speaking at the gala was Alina Gerlovin Spaulding, who shared the story of how her family was rescued by the UJA from the former Soviet Union in the 1970s and urged members of the audience to become involved with UJA.

Bodow, a Yale grad who was a journalist for Wired, New York Magazine, Salon.com and Individual Investor before joining the show in 2002, said that if people are relying on The Daily Show as a primary source of news, they are probably very poorly informed.

"I would say that if people do watch us as a news source, I think that says a lot more about news organizations' failures," Bodow said.

"We don't cover a lot of things that are important... You've got to read a newspaper – something."

When Javerbaum – a Harvard grad who started as a staff writer on The Daily Show in 1999 before attaining his current position as executive producer in 2006 – and Bodow took to the stage, they advised the gathering that they weren't used to presenting together, but they had a solution.

They sat across from each other, taking turns interviewing each other, clearly poking fun at overly enthusiastic, obnoxious journalists who ask leading questions and make statements under the guise of queries.

"People love you. People adore you. You're part of the best show ever. Everyday, you're able to convert so much news into comedy genius," Javerbaum "asked" Bodow. "What is a typical day like for you?"

Answering seriously, Bodow said that a team of writers and researchers typically start their day at 9 a.m. and work until 7 p.m., when the show is taped.

He said that he, Javerbaum and Jon Stewart, the host, spend a lot of time reworking and revising the script.

"Sometimes things change a great deal, sometimes, we change just a joke here and there," he said, adding that they rewrite over and over again until everyone is happy with the final product.

David Javerbaum and Steve Bodow say that those who rely on The Daily Show as a primary source of news are poorly informed.

Bodow then turned the tables on Javerbaum, asking him a question. "As someone who watches the show a great deal, I couldn't help but notice that you seem to cover [Republican presidential candidate John] McCain and [Republican vice-presidential candidate Sarah] Palin a great deal more than [president-elect Barack] Obama and [Vice-president-elect Joe] Biden. Am I right to notice that?" he asked, referring to the claim that The Daily Show has a liberal bias.

"Well, one of the main reasons behind that is that they do a disproportionately higher amount of stupid shit," Javerbaum said, delivering the line dryly, and pausing for enthusiastic applause laughter.

"If you're covering a football game, and the game is 45 to nothing, the sportscaster is not advised to treat both teams as if they are playing at the same level."

Bodow and Javerbaum also dispelled any myths that Stewart is just a talking head.

"Jon Stewart is, at the end of the day, the executive producer, the head writer, and he is involved in every aspect of a joke and the script," Javerbaum said.

He added that Stewart is an "incredible observer" and "he has an incredible ability to cut to the heart of the matter when it comes to hypocrisy."

Perhaps not wanting to be too serious for too long, he said, "Jon is actually a high-functioning moron. He is an idiot savant. The one thing he can do is host a relevant, satirical, political news show. Otherwise, I wouldn't say he doesn't know how to tie his shoes, but he doesn't know where on the body shoes go."

They talked about the field pieces, in which the show's correspondents – two of whom, Samantha Bee and Jason Jones, are Canadian – conduct ridiculous interviews with seemingly unsuspecting subjects.

Javerbaum said that it would be naive to think that the subjects aren't aware that it's a joke, but "they are not as in on the joke as they think they are.

"The one thing we've learned over the years about the human condition is that people want to be on television at the expense of dignity, self-awareness..." he trailed off, eliciting laughter from the crowd.

The question and answer period provided even more laughs when one audience member asked if people should fear Sarah Palin because of her claim that she can see Russia and Canada from her backyard.

"It's no big deal. I can see the sun from my house," Javerbaum said.

Another woman in the audience asked a question not about the show, but about how her single friend could go about dating Bodow.

"This is a Jewish appeal!" Bodow said.

"Have you ever met a comedy writer up close?" Javerbaum asked, questioning her judgment for wanting to date him. "Do you know what we smell like? Do you know what we do on the weekends?"

When someone brought up the fact that Stewart's Jewishness often comes through on the show, Javerbaum said, "Jon is very Jewish and a lot of us are and... The truth of the reality is... we don't shy away from that."

Finally, when another asked how they decide what's funny and what makes the cut for the script, Bodow summed it all up by saying, "Well, I guess I would say, it's called a sense of humour."

Israeli teens reflect on upcoming army service

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Eight high school students from Danciger School in Kiryat Shmonah, Israel, visited Winnipeg recently.

Their visit, to Gray Academy from Oct. 24 to Nov. 5, was sponsored by the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg's Partnership 2000 program.

Several of the Israeli teens will be going into the Israeli army next year.

Yoav Zenaty, age 18, the president of Danciger's student council, wants to be a combat fighter in the paratroopers unit.

He said, "One of the reasons I want to go into a combat unit in the army is because my city of Kiryat Shmonah [which borders Lebanon] has gotten bombed so many times since I've been born. I feel it's my duty to protect my country and my family. If I don't defend it, who will?"

Zenaty added, "The kids in the kibbutzim nearby Kiryat Shmonah are more patriotic than the kids in the city itself. Most of the Jews in Kiryat Shmonah are of Moroccan and Persian descent. Most of the army-age kids I know will serve in the army in some way...Some don't want to do it. Most don't want to go into combat units. They prefer to be jobnikim [people who do tasks that don't involve combat]...

"I'm really against those who try to evade army service. It's a mistake to do that. There are many ways to serve or volunteer in the army that will not involve combat, and everyone should contribute in some way."

Afik Biton, 18, agrees with his friend Zenaty and also wants to be in a combat unit. As he said, "It's not a simple decision, but we have to protect our country.

"We had friends in the last war [in Lebanon in 2006] who died to protect us. Liran Sa'adia was one of them."

Zenaty and Biton noted that money raised in Winnipeg went toward building Beit Liran, a house for soldiers without families in Israel, in memory of Sa'adia.

Biton said he is concerned that "another war may break out" during their army service.

As Zenaty said, "Hezbollah still exists, and they are back to their prewar strength, with lots of weapons."

Yahav Vaknin, 18, wants to be a madrichat shirion, someone who is responsible for checking over soldiers before they go into battle. She said she is looking forward to doing her service.

"It's very exciting for me to be a soldier. I recently went to Poland with my grade, and that trip strengthened my desire to stay in Israel. Before that trip, I wasn't sure that I wanted to stay in Israel. I thought that if I got a good opportunity outside of Israel, I could live elsewhere. But I didn't feel at home outside of Israel, and now I know Israel is the only thing for me," she said.

Shira Sa'adia, another 18-year-old (who is not related to Liran Sa'adia), says she wants to be in the educational wing of the army. "I want to organize day trips and social activities for the soldiers."

Biton said he is intent on trying to remain in Kiryat Shmonah. "I loved growing up there, and I want my children to grow up there."

Zenaty says he's not sure he'll remain in Kiryat Shmonah. "I love the area, but if there won't be a good educational institute [to attend], I won't stay. I want to develop myself. Tel-Chai College [nearby] is considered OK, but it is not one of the best."

The students also spoke about recent elections for mayor of Kiryat Shmonah.

Biton's father, who runs all of the community centres in Kiryat Shmonah, entered the race for mayor, which had 10 candidates (nine men and one woman).

When asked why there were so many candidates this year, Zenaty laughed, "Politicayim b'shekel." (Eveyone thinks they can be a politician.)

Biton said, "There were even some candidates who ran for mayor last time in different areas and lost so now they decided to try in Kiryat Shmonah."

Hodiel Ben Natan, a teacher at Ramat Korazim elementary school, near Rosh Pina, who also came to Winnipeg on the Partnership 2000 program, said, "When I walked down the main street in Kiryat Shmonah, there were so many signs for candidates for mayor, I couldn't remember them all."

Ruth Bar Maoz, the principal of the elementary school in Yesud HaMa'aleh, near Rosh Pina, who lives in Kiryat Shmonah, said, "I think there were so many candidates because there are so many problems in Kiryat Shmonah and everyone thinks that he knows best how to fix them."

Ve'ahavta gala to honour Rubenstein

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

As Canadian national director of the always emotional March of the Living, Eli Rubenstein has seen his share of sorrow and joy.

This weekend, he will be honoured for his years of work and dedication helping thousands of people to never forget the atrocities of the Shoah and to practice tikkun olam.

Ve'ahavta, Toronto's non-profit Jewish humanitarian organization, will present him with its annual Tikkun Olam Award in the field of education at its second annual Starry Nights gala, to be held Nov. 16 at the Sheraton Centre Toronto Hotel.

Eli Rubenstein

Rubenstein, who has headed the Canadian march for the past 20 years, also assists Ve'ahavta in organizing its annual Passover seder for the homeless.

The March of the Living website says that one of the march's main goals is to "never again allow any kind of racial discrimination directed by any individual or group in society against another to gain strength. Though Jews have been primarily the victims of racism, this goal also relates to racism expressed by Jews towards others. The diminution of the dignity of any member of the human family is a cardinal violation of Jewish ethical teachings."

Speaking to The CJN last week, Rubenstein said he was "humbled" by the award, but added that "the real credit should go to the Holocaust survivors. They're the people that educated me. They rebuilt their lives from the ashes of the Holocaust. It's their courage that inspired me to do what I do."

Avrum Rosensweig, Ve'ahavta's founding director, singled out and saluted Rubenstein for his ongoing "contributions in the field of education and for opening the eyes of many people to the reality that remembering can lead to change."

Furthering the topic of remembrance, this year's gala keynote speaker will be renowned journalist and activist Mariane Pearl.

Pearl, the wife of slain Jewish journalist Daniel Pearl – the Wall Street Journal reporter who was beheaded by terrorists in Pakistan in 2002, prompting her to launch a personal campaign of tolerance and peace between nations – is scheduled to hand out six awards Sunday evening, as well as talk about her continuing quest to remember her husband and her attempts to address the injustices in the world.

Ve'ahavta expects Pearl's talk to stir her audience's "consciousness... and her strength and resilient spirit will inspire us as she delivers a message of justice and hope," the gala website said.

With its ability to bring in high-profile guest speakers, Ve'ahavta's Starry Nights gala is quickly becoming a major community event.

Last year's inaugural keynote speaker was Elie Wiesel.

Others being honoured with Tikkun Olam Awards at this year's gala are doctors Norman Epstein and Acol Dor, co-founders of Canadians Against Slavery and Torture in Sudan, who will receive Ve'ahavta's humanitarian award.

Holocaust survivor Judy Cohen will receive the remembrance award.

John Kelsall, president of Health Partners International of Canada, will receive the medical award, and student advocate Danny Richmond will get Ve'ahavta's student affairs award. A last award for philanthropy will be announced at the ceremony, Ve'ahavta said.

"All the people we have chosen for Tikkun Olam [Awards] are role models for our community and the world. They exemplify community and decency in a very powerful way," Rosensweig said.

Livni, Netanyahu stress need for peace agreements

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel and the Palestinian Authority presented the Quartet with several agreements outlining the way negotiations on the Mideast conflict's core issues are to proceed next year.

Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, who updated the Quartet at Sharm el-Sheikh with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas last Sunday, said she was convinced she has not repeated the mistakes of Camp David in 2000.

She said although no deal was reached this year, both sides are determined to continue talks.

Tzipi Livni

Livni and Abbas stressed "the need for continuous, uninterrupted, direct bilateral negotiations."

They asked the international community to support Israel and the Palestinian Authority's efforts in the framework of the Annapolis process, the Quartet said in a statement read by UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon. "The Quartet emphasized the importance of continuity of the peace process," Ban said.

Livni also called on the Quartet – the United States, United Nations, European Union and Russia – to let Israel and the Palestinians handle matters on their own. Both parties realize they're on the same side and that the Israelis and Palestinians know best which steps are appropriate and when to implement them, Livni said.

Livni decided several months ago that it would be impossible to reach a detailed agreement with the Palestinians this year because neither side was ready and major gaps remain on the core issues.

She also thinks the alternative – a partial agreement or agreement in principle – is worse, because it will not actually end the conflict. That's why she opposed Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's proposal to Abbas, which included a resolution of the border issue and a partial solution of the refugee issue. The question of Jerusalem was deferred.

Livni was concerned that if Israel and the Palestinians did not reach an agreement, the Annapolis process would fail and talks would come to a standstill, which would put pressure on Israel or spark violent clashes. She is haunted by the results of the 2000 Camp David summit, whose failure was followed by the second intifadah.

Over the past three months, Livni and her Palestinian counterpart, Ahmed Qureia, have been working to figure out how to make the transition from the 2008 negotiations to talks in 2009.

Both sides have agreed that there is nothing to be gained by a partial deal. They have also agreed that the international community must be convinced that the process is progressing and that they should allow it to move forward without pressure or foreign initiatives.

Benjamin Netanyahu

Israel and the Palestinians scored a victory when they convinced U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to withdraw her request that they present a document summarizing the negotiation achievements at the UN General Assembly in September.

Meanwhile, Foreign Minister Livni told her Russian counterpart Sergei Lavrov during the Sharm summit on Sunday that Moscow must respect a weapons embargo on Hezbollah.

Livni said that a clear message must be sent to Syria and Iran to halt the flow of Russian-supplied weapons to the Lebanese militant group.

All flow of weapons, direct or otherwise, violates UN Security Council resolutions on the matter and leaves the world no option but to respond with force, Livni warned Lavrov.

Opposition leader and Likud chairman Benjamin Netanyahu also met with international peace envoy Tony Blair in Jerusalem on Monday, a day after Israeli, Palestinian and international negotiators pledged to continue the talks after U.S. President George W. Bush leaves office early next year.

Netanyahu said Monday that if he were to be elected prime minister in the coming elections, he would continue political peace negotiations with the Palestinians.

Polls currently place Netanyahu's conservative Likud party and Livni's centrist Kadima party neck and neck ahead of February elections.

Rabin remembered at rally

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak called right-wing Israeli extremists "cancerous growths" during a rally Sunday at the Tel Aviv square where former prime minister Yitzhak Rabin was assassinated 13 ago.

"The violence is also creeping today – they once called them bad apples in the bunch, but today they are dangerous, metastasizing cancerous growths," Barak said.

Barak added that such extremists pose a serious threat to "democracy, rule of law, the Israel Defence Forces, the police, and all of the ruling authorities in a normal society."

Barak also stressed the importance of peace, saying "we have no other country, and no other way, there is no alternative to peace," Barak said.

President Shimon Peres also addressed the crowd, saying, "Yitzhak, you are missed, but your way has not been lost." Peres implored those gathered to continue coming each year in memory of Rabin, saying that it is people like them who help Israel to remain democratic and safe from anarchy.

Later in the evening, president of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters James Hoffa, addressed the crowd, telling them how much of a friend they have in U.S. president-elect Barack Obama and how excited he is to be on his first trip to Israel. He then led the crowd in chants of "Yes we can!" a slogan for Obama's presidential campaign.

Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni expressed her sadness at the loss of Barak, saying, "Yitzhak was my prime minister, he was yours, and he was the prime minister of all of those who are not here tonight and weren't there that night," referring to the peace rally 13 years ago where Rabin was murdered.

Saturday's rally in front of the Tel Aviv city hall has become an annual pilgrimage for ordinary Israelis to show respect for the beloved leader. Participants filled Rabin Square and spilled into the surrounding streets, some carrying signs and banners calling for peace and tolerance.

Rabin's government negotiated the first interim peace accord with the Palestinians, and he won a Nobel Peace Prize for his efforts.

Rabin was gunned down on Nov. 4, 1995, at the end of a peace rally by right-wing extremist Yigal Amir, an opponent of his policy of making peace with Palestinians.

Hopeful about Obama

The Palestinian Authority president said he believes the U.S. president-elect is serious about helping Israel and the Palestinians reach peace. Mahmoud Abbas said in Budapest, where he was visiting the Hungarian president, that he hopes Barack Obama will be more sympathetic to the Palestinian cause than his predecessors. Meanwhile, leaders of Iran and Hamas expressed hope Obama will usher in a new era of relations between the United States and the Islamic world. Hamas leader Mahmoud Zahar said Israeli influence on U.S. policy made it unlikely he would talk to Hamas, at least initially. Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, in a letter he sent to Obama, said the world expects major changes in U.S. policy, the New York Times reported.

Gaza clashes shake truce

An Israeli air strike on Gaza, in response to more than 50 Qassam rockets fired into Israel in the previous 48 hours, killed one Palestinian gunman last Wednesday night. The Israeli army said it was targeting a rocket launcher in the attack. In response, Palestinians in Gaza fired more rockets into Israel, causing no injuries or damage. The Hamas rocket attacks began late Tuesday night after an Israeli army operation in Gaza to destroy a tunnel used for arms smuggling that military intelligence learned would be used to kidnap an Israeli soldier into Gaza. Most of the rocket attacks were centred on the Sderot area. One rocket landed in a residential area of Ashkelon.

Divorce law passed

Israeli MKs passed a law preventing the extortion of women by husbands who refuse to grant a get, a Jewish divorce. The law will allow the division of property between a husband and wife before the divorce is granted under certain conditions. Recalcitrant husbands often use extortion to obtain all or the majority of joint property before agreeing to a divorce. A woman can't remarry without a get. Fifty-eight MKs backed the bill, while 21 others, mostly from haredi parties, voted against it.

U.S. Jews laud chief of staff choice

By NATASHA MOZGOVAYA and ANSHEL PFEFFER
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — America's Jewish community welcomed U.S. president-elect Barack Obama's pick of Congressman Rahm Emanuel for the post of chief of staff, saying that the choice shows Obama has learned from the mistakes of previous Democratic presidents.

Last week, Obama announced that Emanuel, a key official in the administration of former president Bill Clinton, had accepted his offer and will serve as the next White House chief of staff.

William Daroff, director of the Washington office of the United Jewish Communities, an umbrella organization representing 155 Jewish federations and 400 independent Jewish communities across North America, said last week that "Emanuel is among the smartest political tacticians and policymakers that is on the scene in Washington.

"He was singularly responsible for guiding many of the top legislative priorities of the Clinton administration when he was a senior White House aide. He crafted the House Democrats plan to regain the majority when he was their campaign committee chairman," Daroff went on to say.

"Choosing Rep. Emanuel is a sign that president-elect Obama is learning from the mistakes of the two most recent Democratic presidents, who brought in Washington outsiders to run the White House, and did so at their own peril, often finding themselves in battles with the Washington Democratic establishment. Emanuel's selection will avoid such 'freshman mistakes,'" he continued.

"Rep. Emanuel is also a good friend of Israel, coming from good Irgun stock, davening at an Orthodox synagogue, and sending his children to Jewish day schools," Daroff concluded.

Ira Forman, executive director of the National Jewish Democratic Council, echoed Daroff's approval, saying in a statement that "Obama made an outstanding selection. Emanuel has been a forceful and effective leader within the Democratic Party. His voting record and leadership in support of the U.S.-Israel relationship are outstanding."

"Emanuel has deep Jewish roots and strong ties to the Jewish community. Emanuel, the son of an Israeli immigrant, has a proven commitment to Israel's security and served as civilian volunteer on an Israeli military base during the Persian Gulf War of 1991," the statement continued.

Emanuel, a hard-charging Chicagoan, accepted Obama's offer for the job after struggling over family and political considerations. By moving into a top White House job for a second time, Emanuel will have to put aside hopes of becoming speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives.

The son of a Jerusalem-born pediatrician who was a member of the pre-state Irgun, Emanuel was a key figure in the Clinton administration, where he was known for his blunt management style. His selection is a shift in tone for Obama, who chose more low-key leadership for his presidential campaign.

In the tense talks with the Palestinians at Wye Plantation in 1998, the Israeli team, headed by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, was especially wary of Emanuel. His fluent Hebrew, his instinctive grasp of the Israeli mindset and above all his complete loyalty to his boss made the Israelis afraid to talk near him.

Ten years later, Israel's next prime minister will meet Emanuel in a loftier post, as Obama's chief of staff.

"He has a kind of directness and coarseness that is very familiar to Israelis," a veteran Israeli diplomat told Ha'aretz. "But it doesn't necessarily bring him closer to us. One thing is certain: Israelis will not be able to pull the wool over his eyes."

Emanuel's quick rise to a party leadership position in the House underlines his political acumen, and his choice by Obama points to the president-elect's preparations to move quickly on getting his legislative agenda through Congress. Emanuel will play a major role in facilitating and selling Obama's plans.

In his previous positions, Emanuel was in charge of political and domestic issues, but in Clinton's administration in 1993, as senior presidential adviser for domestic affairs, he also dealt with foreign policy, which was important to the president. For example, he produced the Oslo accords signing ceremony on the White House lawn.

Of all the Israelis he came into contact with during his career, the ones he became closest to were the close aides of former prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, including the director of the prime minister's office, Shimon Shevess. The two are still close friends.

Israeli officials are divided in their opinions about his involvement in foreign affairs in general and the Middle East peace process in particular. The chief of staff usually focuses on the president's political work.

Kosher meat shortage feared

By BEN HARRIS
JTA

NEW YORK — With the kosher meat producer Agriprocessors facing mounting financial problems and a fire-related shutdown at another major kosher producer, industry insiders say major supply disruptions in the United States are inevitable and that kosher consumers should brace themselves for rough times.

In the past two weeks, Agriprocessors, the nation's largest kosher meat supplier, has endured a cascade of awful news. First, Iowa's labour commissioner hit the company with nearly $10 million (US) in fines for alleged wage violations at its massive Postville, Iowa, plant. Then, the son of the company's founder was arrested on charges that he helped purchase fake identification for the company's illegal workers. And on Oct. 31, news broke that a St. Louis bank had initiated foreclosure proceedings after Agriprocessors and its owners defaulted on a $35 million loan.

Last week, the firm filed for bankruptcy protection in a move that appeared to be an effort to pre-empt foreclosure by the bank, which had sued Agriprocessors for defaulting on the loan. Kosher industry insiders are predicting that the company won't pull through. Company officials didn't respond to multiple requests for comment.

Many Israelis concerned about Obama

Still, there is a more general fear among some Israelis that Obama may try to improve America's battered standing in the Muslim world by forcing Israel to make concessions to the Palestinians.

Foreign Ministry officials insist that so far there is no indication of anything like that happening. Still, Livni issued what appeared to be a veiled appeal to Obama.

"The world," she said, "should respect the current peace process and not expect Israel to make short cuts that could undermine its basic interests."

If there are changes in U.S. policy on the Palestinian track, Israeli officials do not expect them to come soon. In the short term, they say, the new Obama administration will be focused on the global economic crisis. After that, other issues – like Iraq, Afghanistan and mending fences with the Russians – will take precedence over the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Where Obama's election may make the most difference is on the Israeli political scene.

On the face of it, Obama's election does not augur well for the conservative Likud leader, Benjamin Netanyahu, who is leading in some polls in the race to become Israel's next prime minister. When Netanyahu was prime minister from 1996 to 1999, there was no meeting of minds between the hawkish Israeli leader, who was determined to hold onto parts of the West Bank he viewed as vital Israeli assets, and a Democratic administration in Washington determined to stabilize the Middle East by achieving a historic Israeli-Palestinian peace agreement.

The friction between Netanyahu and former president Bill Clinton was one of the main factors that eventually cost Netanyahu the premiership, some pundits have argued.

Livni, the Kadima party leader and Netanyahu's main rival in the race for prime minister, already is warning that if Netanyahu becomes prime minister again, Israel and the Obama administration could be on a similar collision course.

"If Israel presents itself as a country that opposes any peace process, then the world, led by the U.S., will try to force a process on it," she told the Knesset last Wednesday.

"Just saying 'no' has never helped Israeli diplomacy."

Netanyahu rejects these arguments out of hand. In an open letter of congratulation to Obama published in Israel's daily Yediot Achronot, Netanyahu says he and Obama have a good working relationship and that it was after the two met in Washington that Obama submitted a bill to Congress to tighten sanctions on Iran. Netanyahu also said that in his meeting with Obama in Jerusalem in July, Obama "showed interest in my plan to advance peace with the Palestinians through economic peace first."

Obama's election also could prompt Israelis concerned about possible pressure from Washington to gravitate toward Netanyahu, who is likelier to stand up to the administration in Washington.

Livni is presenting herself as the candidate for prime minister most likely to share a common language with Obama. Both would be vigorous first-time leaders dedicated to newer, cleaner politics based on pragmatic, middle-of-the road solutions.

She toured the beleaguered Israeli town of Sderot with Obama in July and said she saw a man "committed to Israel's well-being and security." In their meetings, Livni said Obama showed a deep understanding of Israel's positions and needs, including on why Israel cannot accept the return of Palestinian refugees to Israel.

Defence Minister Ehud Barak, the Labor leader and the third major-party candidate for prime minister, is seeking to portray himself as someone who would be able to work with Obama on the basis of their mutual quest for regional stability.

But Barak would like to see the Obama administration shift its Arab-Israeli focus from the Palestinian track to the Syrian track, where he believes the chances of success and strategic gains are greater.

Barak and other promoters of the Syrian track believe it will take significant U.S. economic and political inducements to persuade Syria to break with its sponsor in Tehran, and they believe Obama might be willing to make commitments the Bush administration would not. So do the Syrians, who expressed jubilation at Obama's victory.

Jewish PM elected in New Zealand

JTA

The son of a Jewish refugee was elected the prime minister of New Zealand.

John Key's conservative National Party swept to victory in the Nov. 8 election, snapping the nine-year reign of Helen Clark and her Labour Party.

Key, 47, said the National Party, with 59 seats, had avowed support from two minor parties that would enable him to forge a coalition of 65 seats in the 122-seat parliament. Labor garnered 43 seats.

A father of two children, he doesn't practice Judaism, but says he is "very respectful" of the Jewish faith.

Key, who spoke at a celebration to mark Israel's 60th birthday earlier this year, said he hopes to visit the Jewish state, where he has cousins, and pay his respects at Yad Vashem.

A celebration of victory

By HOWARD ADELMAN

Guest Voice

Neither American presidential candidate inspired me to believe that he could deal with, let alone resolve, the enormous financial crisis we face or end the no-front wars being fought in Iraq, Afghanistan and a dozen other smaller hot spots around the globe. Though Barack Obama may have a greater sense of justice, it's not clear how his health insurance plan or his bow to protectionism would help diminish the rapid acceleration and deceleration of the wealth of the rich and the stagnancy of the rest. Nevertheless, Obama's victory needs to be celebrated.

His victory means that black is not only beautiful for blacks and hippy-inclined youth who wore afros in the '60s and '70s – including my eldest son, now a hair-challenged professor at Princeton University. Black has become beautiful for everyone. Obama allows not only blacks but every one of us to stand proud. Obama inverted the witchcraft, demonology and black arts of the Republicans into the white glowing halo of hope and adumbrated a possible end to the politics of paranoia.

In turning style into substance, Obama showed how gravitas could beat back the impetuous, impulsive and erratic behaviour of a senior citizen playing the adolescent. Obama is a dancer, the Muhammad Ali of the political boxing ring who proved that a swift and intelligent move could avoid the constant jabbing of a determined fighter.

Instead of throwing back John McCain's charges that he had cavorted with American Weathermen terrorists by recalling McCain's secret meetings with the ruthless military dictator of Chile, Gen. Augusto Pinochet, Obama skipped sideways. His fancy footwork undermined the dominant metaphor, in which pundits weighed whether a body blow had been struck.

I've just returned from Australia, where Aussies favoured Obama 70 per cent to McCain's seven per cent, even though McCain's persona celebrates the Aussie battler, the little guy and underdog who toughs it out with too little money. McCain managed to keep under the radar the fact that his advisers were paid more than Obama's, that he owned 13 automobiles and that he couldn't remember how many properties that he and his wife own (for the record, it's seven).

Obama is a strategist who magically transformed community organizing into a nationwide endeavour to beat a headline-grabbing tactician. He showed that a networker could beat a netminder who cultivated the old Republican community instead of bringing a new community to support his platform. Obama paradoxically proved himself to be a partisan unifier who gave the Republican brand its biggest black eye and revealed that his purported maverick opponent was really a cross-dresser.

For Obama, at heart and in substance, is a constitutionalist rather than a unilateralist in both domestic and foreign policy. He showed that an exchange of ideas could beat the doctrine and ideology of intelligent design in either its transcendent divine or immanent natural (i.e., the economic "laws" of the market) forms.

McCain was a fearless and, therefore, rash, rather than courageous, opponent. Courage is a virtue that teaches us what to fear, not to be fearless. Courage teaches us how to beat that fear. The greatest American fear has been that whites would never elect a black man, let alone one who was a product of what used to be called miscegenation, for interracial marriage had been illegal in many American states just fifty years ago, and such laws were struck down by the U.S. Supreme Court in 1967.

President-elect Barack Obama

Forty-five years ago in the March on Washington, Martin Luther King Jr. gave his famous "I have a dream" speech. Obama won the presidency not by dramatizing the shameful condition and ill treatment of many blacks with which King began his sonorous oratory, but by celebrating the American dream that any American child could become president.

That was truly an act of courage.

Sobie's new saunas provide an affordable oasis of comfort

One minute, you're chilled to the bone by winter's bite. The next, you're basking in soothing warmth. From discomfort to bliss in two minutes flat — at Sobie's.

Sobie's? The BBQ people? Febian and Mark? The guys who give you the best sizzle a grill can deliver?

Sobie's reputation has been forged on the grill, but the infrared technology that has revolutionized the BBQ industry is now heating up sauna sales as well.

Sobie's carries the Saunatec line, built in the US according to the same rigorous standards established by Helo, the parent company in Finland. They offer quality construction, comfort and features at prices as low as $2,999. No installation is needed; they're sold in easy-to-assemble kits requiring few tools and minimal mechanical skills. And these babies have all the bells and whistles, from built-in DVD players to soothing colour therapy.

Both the traditional stone-and-steam and infrared units are available in either hemlock or red cedar. The cedar models are slightly more expensive, but the incredible natural aroma that envelopes you is priceless.

A sauna not only feels good, it's good for you. Whether it's the physiological changes that occur in the warmth of a sauna — or simply the time spent in this calm, still retreat — it feels wonderful. It's an antidote to daily stress, a place where you can relax and restore body and soul. A sauna truly makes you feel better, look better, and sleep better. Its myriad of health benefits are well-documented:

- In addition to reducing stress, the deep, penetrating warmth soothes aching joints;
- According to medical research, a sauna can significantly reduce the incidence of colds and influenza;
- The steam vapour action helps relieve uncomfortable congestion from colds or allergies;
- The deep sweating achieved in the sauna can help reduce levels of lead, copper, zinc, nickel and mercury — all toxins commonly occurring in our environment;
- Sweat rinses bacteria out of the epidermal layer and sweat ducts. Cleansing of the pores improves the capillary circulation and gives the skin a soft, beautiful appearance;
- You can easily sweat off a pound and 300 calories in a single session.

Holocaust novel rooted in author's childhood memory

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

The emotional core of Edeet Ravel's latest book, Your Sad Eyes and Unforgettable Mouth (Viking Canada), a novel that examines the emotional impact of the Holocaust on children of survivors, is rooted in a childhood memory that has haunted the author for decades.

Edeet Ravel

She recalls how helpless she felt watching her Grade 4 classmates taunt a new choir director at the Hebrew Academy of Montreal.

She was struck by the vulnerability of the eastern European man, who clearly could not control the class. "I didn't realize he was a Holocaust survivor, but instinctively I knew that he had been traumatized.

"The kids were so nasty. They were throwing things at him. I could not believe that these kids could not see how vulnerable he was. I was so sad for him."

The Israeli-born Ravel, who spent seven years on a kibbutz before her Canadian parents re-established themselves in Montreal, set her new book in Montreal during the 1960s and '70s, the era of her own coming of age. At that time, discussion about the Holocaust in schools was discouraged, because educators feared the horrific history would traumatize children, she explains.

"The teachers were not allowed to teach or even talk about the Holocaust. I remember one teacher saying, 'I wish I could tell you. I wish I could tell you.'

"I had only the vaguest notion of what the Holocaust was."

She says many of her classmates were children of survivors. "Some of them did not know about the Holocaust and some knew, but they didn't talk about it."

The experiences of Ravel's second husband, John Detre – he grew up with seven Holocaust survivors in his home– was the inspiration for the narrative, she says.

The character, Patrick, one of the male protagonists, is based on Detre. "He had no complaints about the way I depicted him. He liked the novel very much."

One of Detre's aunts, she adds, was the model for brothers Anthony and Patrick's mother.

Your Sad Eyes and Unforgettable Mouth follows the lives of four youngsters – Maya, Rosie, Patrick and Anthony – during their formative preteen and adolescent years. Aside from Patrick, the other characters are composites of people Ravel grew up with, she says.

While the characters' childhood experiences are all different, as children of Holocaust survivors, the four are emotionally wounded by their respective parents' painful histories, told and untold.

Maya, the narrator is raised by her overprotective grandmother and mother. While the grandmother is silent about the war, the mother constantly talks about it. She has trouble containing her emotions. In contrast, Rosie's father talks about his war-time experiences from a rational perspective. Unlike the other parents, the mother of Patrick and Anthony tries to escape her past by hiding her Jewish roots.

Ravel, 53, who has written five works of adult fiction and four children's novels, was catapulted from virtual anonymity to literary stardom in 2003, when Ten Thousand Lovers, the first book of her acclaimed Tel Aviv Trilogy, was shortlisted for the Governor General's Award for literature, the Koret Jewish Book Award, the Quebec Writers Federation Award and Amazon.ca/Books in Canada First Novel Award.

The following year her second novel, Look for Me, received the Hugh MacLennan Prize for Fiction, while her third book, Wall of Light, was shortlisted for the Giller Prize in 2005. It won a Canadian Jewish Book Award – the Martin and Beatrice Fischer Prize for Fiction – in 2006.

Ravel, who lives in Guelph near her daughter Larissa, a 21-year-old university student, is not spending much time there these days. She's been on the road promoting her new book, which was launched in September at the Gladstone Hotel in Toronto.

In October, the tour included readings at Books and Brunch in Montreal and at the Barbara Frum Library in Toronto and she was a featured writer at the Ottawa Writers Festival. This month, she heads to Vancouver for the Jewish Book Fair, which runs from Nov. 22 to 27.

When asked how she came to write Your Sad Eyes and Unforgettable Mouth, Ravel says she listened to a voice in her head. "I never choose a story. It chooses me.

"A voice says, 'Write me, Write me.' If the voice doesn't let go, I write it."

Play reflects experiences of 'Kindertransport' passengers

By RENA GODFREY
Special to The CJN

Kindertransport is a highly moving and heartfelt play about a German Jewish girl who escapes from Nazi Germany to Britain.

The "Kindertransport" is the name of the rescue mission of nearly 10,000 Jewish children that took place from 1938 to 1940.

Although a fictitious character, the girl's story reflects the true accounts of the Jewish children who travelled without their parents from Germany and German-occupied territories to Britain.

Written by British playwright Diane Samuels, the play transports the audience back and forth in time, exposing Eva's (Jennifer Dzialoszynski) past and present life.

The central setting of Kindertransport takes place in an attic, with boxes and trunks scattered on stage. It opens in Eva's home in Hamburg in 1939, where Helga (Nancy Beatty), Eva's mother, tries to prepare nine-year-old Eva, her only child, for her journey alone to Britain.

Eva is beside herself with worry, not wanting to go and anxious about when she will be able to see her parents again. Helga promises to join Eva in a few months' time, once she and her husband are able to leave Germany.

The scene then switches forward in time to the early 1980s, in the attic of Evelyn's (Corrine Koslo) London house. Evelyn, who is Eva as an adult, searches among her boxes for dishes and other household items to give to her college-age daughter, Faith (Jenny Young), because she is moving out on her own.

More of Eva's young life unfolds, as Evelyn's secrets are uncovered. The audience sees Eva transform before their eyes from an unsure, frightened nine-year-old girl who speaks mostly German and a poor English to an educated northern English teenage girl.

When Faith discovers old letters and photographs, a Haggadah and a storybook written in German, Faith confronts her grandmother, Lil, Evelyn's foster mother, and learns that the little Jewish girl who stayed with her during the war, was in fact, her very own mother.

Even when confronted by Faith, Evelyn refuses to tell the truth about her Jewish past. By the end of the play, Evelyn's true past is revealed, along with the complexities surrounding her decision to shed her Jewish past and identity.

Although the play's subject matter deals with the horrors of the Holocaust, the themes are universal. Director Christopher Newton says: "It's about many things – the difficulty of giving things up, rejection and fighting for recognition of identity."

Waiting at a train station in London, a teary-eyed Eva asks Lil why her parents did not keep their promise to join her in Britain. Lil replies: "Wars break promises."

Kindertransport bears witness to the emotional trauma of Eva's young life and many other children like her.

Watching the play, audiences will gain a greater understanding of these children and the adults that they became.

Kindertransport runs until Nov. 23 at Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, Al Green Theatre. For tickets, call 416-366-7723 or 1-800-708-6754 or visit online at www.hgjewishtheatre.com.

Panel discusses female writers about the Holocaust

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The CJN

Women who write about the Holocaust was the subject of a recent panel discussion that included award-winning authors Karen Levine and Kathy Kacer.

"As a woman, I'm interested in writing stories from the inside out," said Kacer, who wrote The Secret of Gabi's Dresser. "What's important to me is to be part of the inner experience of the child or whoever is going through that time in history.

"How the individual experiences events – what makes them courageous or not, what makes them fight or not, that's the woman's side I write from."

Held at the 32nd annual Jewish Book Fair at Leah Posluns Theatre, the panel also featured writers Ami Sands Brodoff, who wrote The White Space Between; Gina Roitman, author of Tell Me a Story, Tell Me the Truth; and publisher Margie Wolfe, the co-founder of Second Story Press, which publishes feminist-inspired works.

"I've always felt that women deal with the subject differently than our male colleagues," Wolfe said. "Their works feel different."

Roitman, who's based in Montreal, said that "women are natural repositories for stories, and those stories are usually told by women.

"My mother would say, 'Your father tells you fairy stories. I tell you the truth.' I think that these truths are buried in us a little deeper than in the male psyche."

Roitman added that when she "started to write… her [mother's] voice came through – these stories had a life of their own."

For Brodoff, it was her late mother-in-law Brana Hochova's cassette recordings – recollections of stories from Terezin, Mauthausen and Buchenwald concentration camps – that inspired her to write The White Space Between.

"I'm interested in the contradictory emotions of a survivor and child. Women are often forces of connections. Our writing can be a bridge between the dead and the living, and the past and the present," she said.

Kacer, a former psychologist, said she felt "compelled" to tell the story of how her mother hid in a dining room dresser while Nazi officers searched her home in her children's book, The Secret of Gabi's Dresser.

Levine, a CBC Radio documentary producer, found her inspiration after a visit to Buchenwald at the age of 13.

"For Chanukah, I'd ask for concentration camp books," said the author of Hana's Suitcase. Published in 38 languages, the book has won more awards than any other Canadian children's book.

After she read a story in The CJN about how 13-year-old Holocaust victim Hana Brady's suitcase united her brother George, a survivor living in Toronto, with Fumiko Ishioka, director of Tokyo's Holocaust Education Centre, Levine was inspired to produce radio and TV documentary about it and wrote Hana's Suitcase for young readers.

"What struck me were the unusual combination of generations and continents – Europe, Canada and Tokyo –and the remarkable coincidence of how it came together. It was also the power of the little girl's face and the power of the object – the suitcase. I loved the idea that the object was in some ways nothing, but it held a whole world inside of it." Levine told The CJN.

What keeps the women writers engaged in the subject? Kacer said: "It's the impact the subject has on you personally. I am so inspired by the heroism in every survivor – it's that heroism I capture. That's what keeps me writing those stories."

Cultural fest includes film about massacred Hebron Jews

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The third annual Voices Forward Israeli and Palestinian cultural festival is presenting an interesting lineup of documentary films later this week, five of which are previewed here.

What I Saw in Hebron (Nov. 16 at 11 a.m.), written and directed by Noit and Dan Geva, is on the 1929 mass murder of Jews in that West Bank town, a topic that still inspires fear and anger among Israeli Jews.

The film, which is having its Canadian première at the festival, is divided into three parts.

The first part is on the pre-massacre period, when Arabs and Jews seemed to have gotten along. The second segment examines the murderous rampage, which spelled finis to a venerable community for the next 38 years. The third episode is on the aftermath.

An Israeli Bedouin who lives in an unrecognized encampment

Judging by the comments of Jewish residents who lived there in the 1920s, Arabs and Jews were on friendly terms, and there were no political problems causing tension between the two communities.

"We had a great life in Hebron," says one Jewish man.

By all accounts, Arabs had cordial relations with Sephardi Jews (who constituted the majority of Hebron's Jewish population), but appear to have "hated" Ashkenazi Jews.

The Haganah, the pre-state Jewish army, warned the Jews of an impending pogrom, but the warning was ignored. They simply did not believe that they were in danger. Even some Arabs tipped off their Jewish friends.

A bandaged Jewish victim of the 1929 Arab massacre in Hebron

To their detriment, the Jews did not realize that a false and malicious rumour had taken hold among West Bank Arabs that Jews in Jerusalem had killed thousands of Arabs in an orgy of communal violence.

The first of the 67 Jewish victims to be butchered was the chief Ashkenazi rabbi. He was among 67 Ashkenazi Jews to be killed that day in August.

It appears that many of the murderers, wielding axes, knives and swords, were from outlying villages rather than from Hebron itself. A few local Arabs risked their lives to save their Jewish neighbours.

Jewish survivors recall the frenzy, and old photographs portray the dead and the wounded. Survivors were brought to Jerusalem with only the clothes on their backs and chose not to speak about the massacre.

In the final segment, descendants of survivors return to Hebron on sentimental visits. Several issue a politically charged statement claiming that some Jews who settled in Hebron in the wake of the Six Day War did so for purely political reasons.

Which brings us to Micha Peled's In God's Bunker (Nov. 15 at 5 p.m.). Peled's documentary unfolds against the backdrop of another massacre, perpetrated by Baruch Goldstein in February 1994, at the outset of the Oslo peace process. Goldstein, a Brooklyn-born opponent of territorial concessions, was himself pummelled to death after he killed 29 Palestinian Arabs at the Tomb of the Patriarchs in Hebron.

The Jewish settlers in Hebron, outnumbered by Arabs by 200 to one, are depicted as right-wing zealots who regard Goldstein as a hero and dismiss Arabs as expendable. Certainly, their views are carved in stone, as exemplified by the observation of one of their representatives. He asks: "What claim do we have to Tel Aviv if Hebron does not belong to us?"

Yet, as Peled points out, Hebron is a stronghold of Islamic fundamentalism, where 30 Jews have been killed since the Oslo talks were launched. In short, Hebron is a cauldron of hatred where Arabs and Jews are willing to kill for their respective cause.

Peled interviews few Arab inhabitants, which is a pity. By concentrating almost exclusively on extremist Jewish settlers, he draws only a partial picture of an explosive situation.

You, Me, Jerusalem (Nov. 15, 9 p.m), by George Khleifi and Micha Peled, focuses on an Arab-Jewish ambulance crew in Jerusalem and on Jews and Arabs who support coexistence.

The ambulance crew comes from all walks of life. Salam Da'ana is a physician who once treated Meir Kahane, the Jewish radical. At one point in the film, he is seen attending a Jewish wedding. Oranit Golken worries about ending up as an old maid. Eliahu Brand, a haredi, talks about the risks of entering hostile Arab villages. Dudu Ben Ezra recalls tending to an Arab terrorist who killed one of his friends.

The filmmakers also interview Jewish and Arab newspaper distributors who are old friends and a 15-year-old Jewish teen who works for peace.

You, Me, Jerusalem is a feel-good film with fine intentions, but it's somewhat disjointed.

In Recognized (Nov. 16 at 5 p.m.), Ori Kleiner taps into a serious social and political issue, the problem posed by the existence of more than 40 Bedouin settlements in the northern Negev. These encampments are neither recognized by Israel, nor appear on official maps, and have no access to basic services. Indeed, the Israeli government is trying to demolish these flyblown settlements.

The Bedouin claim to these lands goes against Israel's policy of concentrating Bedouins in urban centres. As the film opens with a shot of a bulldozer scooping up debris from a crushed building, Nuri al-Ukbi shouts, "You will not steal my land. This is my land!"

All the outraged Bedouins here complain of being treated like second-class Israeli citizens. One Bedouin who has been branded as a security threat wants his citizenship back.

The film Recognized opens to the door to a simmering problem that must ultimately be resolved, but regrettably, Kleiner does not present Israel's point of view. He could have done so by interviewing Israeli officials whose mandate is to deal with unrecognized Bedouin villages.

Ashkenaz (Nov. 16 at 7 p.m.), directed by Rachel Leah Jones, looks at "whiteness" in Israel through the prism of Ashkenazi domination of Israeli society. Both Jews and Arabs have plenty to say about the topic, and some of their comments are quite harsh and unforgiving.

All films will be screened at the Royal Cinema on College Street, west of Bathurst.

Film puts unifying symbolism of Israeli flag in doubt

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Toronto documentary filmmaker Igal Hecht recently embarked on a journey across Israel to discover what its flag means to Israelis today, 60 years after its independence.

One would imagine the result, My Flag, would be the most gushing, touchy-feely documentary the director of such provoking films as Disengaging Democracy and Not in My Name has ever produced.

But for the most part, Israeli-born Hecht, 30, finds that like everything else in Israel, the flag only divides Israelis.

My Flag is possibly the filmmaker's most personal film yet. It is about his own journey of discovery and he appears everywhere in the film, walking the length of Israel wrapped in the blue and white flag, confronting and, at times, provoking people for their opinion.

A street performer in Tel Aviv says the flag would make a nice skirt or headgear, while another says he cannot connect with the "Zionist symbols on it."

"To many people," artist Aharan Shevo tells Hecht, "the flag is something to step on like a rag. But to me it is something holy."

In Sderot, a man whose wife was seriously injured in a Qassam attack is noticeably angry. "This flag is nothing to me – if you weren't here, I would burn it like the Arabs do."

But it is in the religious neighbourhood of Mea Shearim in Jerusalem where a man was attacked for carrying an Israeli flag on Independence Day, probably by a member of Neturei Karta (a sect of religious Jews against Zionism) that Hecht loses any objectivity and gets emotionally involved in his story.

He bravely walks through the narrow streets of the religious neighbourhood with the flag wrapped around him like a shroud.

"It's a rag," one man tells him. "I wouldn't even wash the floors with it."

"We don't need a flag, we have HaShem," another says.

Hecht is obviously not welcome here. "Are you trying to provoke us?" one man angrily confronts him. "Go walk somewhere else."

Hecht is visibly shaken as he walks away, commenting on a sign high up on an apartment building that equates Zionism with the Holocaust.

But it's not all negative, and occasionally he is able to find some people with positive things to say, such as iconic folk-singer Saraleh Sharon who says that the meaning of the flag gets stronger every day. "The flag of Israel is our home."

Another person caught in the revelry of a street party on Independence Day in Jerusalem says, "It means that all the people here are my brothers."

An Israeli Druze says the flag of Israel symbolizes the flag of his nation. "I am proud to be a son of this nation."

Other people have their own rather unique interpretation of it. A woman in Metulla says, "In the two triangles that make up the Magen David, you can see the equality between man and woman."

In the end, as Hecht looks out over the Mediterranean, we can sense his disappointment. His journey seems to be unsatisfying. The flag is not the unifying symbol to Israelis that those of us in the Diaspora seem to think it is.

"There is no significance to the flag anymore," a young man tells him. "It's just a star."

My Flag airs on television on the CTS Network on Nov. 16 at 9 pm. You can catch a slightly longer version at a sneak peak at Hava Nagila Banquet Hall, 1118 Centre St. Thornhill, Ont. on Nov. 13 at 8 p.m. Call 416-275-1076 or 905-731-3406 for more information.

Legoland careens from dark comedy to wonky adventure

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

What's the son of a rabbi doing acting as gangsta-rapper JewPac, as naughty boy-scout Sexecutioner and as eccentric Ezra Lamb, who expresses himself with ukuleles and puppets of serial killer Jeffrey Dahmer?

Don't call Amitai Marmorstein, a resident of Victoria, B.C., a follower in his father's footsteps. He may be the son of Rabbi Itzchak Marmorstein, one of the few practitioners of "kabbalistic yoga," but this 22-year-old theatre actor is stretching his artistic muscle in his own way. He's been winning over critics in his biggest stage hit so far, Legoland, set for a two-week run at Toronto's Theatre Passe Muraille starting Nov. 20.

Legoland, produced by Victoria theatre group Atomic Vaudeville, debuted in 2006 in fringe festivals across the country, making its way from Vancouver to Toronto. Following the story of two siblings raised on a co-op farm in Western Canada, Legoland earned kudos for boasting an "aura of wholehearted, hilarious insanity," according to the Vancouver Sun. It won for best new play at the Victoria Fringe Festival.

In an interview, Marmorstein said the play's appeal rests on its odd storytelling techniques. The two characters re-enact important moments in their lives with puppets, music, singing, even a touch of rapping. "This is the kind of play that definitely appeals to the MTV generation," Marmorstein says.

The comedy stars Ezra Lamb and his sister, Penny, both extradited to Canada after attacking one of America's most beloved pop stars. The court allows them to sidestep public service if they create a presentation on their high school years. What follows are scattershot sermons, theories on cannibalism, rants on boy bands and other absurdities that careen Legoland from dark comedy to wonky adventure.

While some have called Legoland a "realistic cartoon," Marmorstein notes it's closer to "tweaked realism." He says Ezra and Penny simply talk to the audience and relate their views on life's oddities, often accentuated with props, song and a sprinkle of fantasy.

Ezra is someone whose snide humour comes from his hopelessness, the actor says. "But he's constantly making jokes about his negativity," Marmorstein adds, which nicely contrasts with Penny's sincere earnestness.

Marmorstein relishes reprising the role he's honed for the past few years. On Atomic Vaudeville's theatre work, he says: "It feels ultra-contemporary, which helps keep it relevant in a world where things become obsolete instantly."

A graduate of the theatre program at the University of Victoria, Marmorstein says he will also act in other roles for a Nov. 30 one-night show at Theatre Passe Muraille, playing characters such as a rapper named JewPac and a boy scout, called the Sexecutioner, who gives sex advice. He has previously dived into varied roles in other plays, such as a Nazi bureaucrat in Laughter! by Peter Barnes, and a major part in Street of Crocodiles, based on the life of writer-artist Bruno Schulz who died in the Holocaust.

So does Legoland have any hidden Jewish content? Marmorstein laughs, then says, "Not really, but the character Ezra makes fun of non-Jews a bit, which I enjoy."

Because Legoland has been such a fixture in his life for the past two years, Marmorstein has a hard time imagining a future without it. He is also uncertain what Legoland can become in the Canadian theatre scene. "I'm not sure what is the fairy tale situation for Legoland because it is so unique a play. It just doesn't seem to fit into the conventional wisdom of what a huge hit play should be," he says.

Legoland runs from Nov. 20 to Dec. 6, with previews starting Nov. 14, at Theatre Passe Muraille. For info, call 416-504-7529.

Composer sets Holocaust poem to music

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Special to the CJN

Award-winning Canadian composer Sid Robinovitch, who lives in Winnipeg, has just released his latest album.

Titled Sefarad (on the Marquis Classics label), it is filled with beautiful music that has been greatly influenced by the Jewish Sephardi tradition.

The name "Sefarad" refers to the Jewish cultural sphere that had its origins in Spain and spread throughout the various countries of southern Europe, North Africa and the eastern Mediterranean.

"You may wonder how an Ashkenazi Jewish boy born in Brandon, Man., became so interested in Sephardic music," says Robinovitch.

"My interest came about when I lived in Toronto and started attending a Sephardic synagogue... where the congregants were from Tangier. They spoke Spanish amongst themselves. I attended services and tried to soak up some of their music."

Robinovitch, who plays piano and has written music for film, radio and TV, adds, "Although I do not play guitar myself, all of the pieces on the Sefarad CD have guitar in them."

Sid Robinovitch

Also featured on the CD are singers and musicians on clarinet, cello, double bass and percussion.

At one time Robinovitch taught social sciences at York University in Toronto, but since 1977 he has devoted himself to musical composition, having studied at Indiana University and the Royal Conservatory of Toronto. His compositions have frequently been broadcasted on CBC Radio.

In 1990, his Sons of Jacob composition for violin and piano was nominated for a Juno Award as best classical composition, and in 1991, his Adieu Babylon was the commissioned work at the Eckhardt-Gramatté National Music Competition.

Robinovitch's album Klezmer Suite, a recording devoted entirely to his music and performed by the Winnipeg Symphony Orchestra, was nominated for a 2002 Juno Award and received a Prairie Music Award for outstanding classical recording.

In the second work on the CD Sefarad, Robinovitch has set biblical text from Song of Songs to enchanting music. As the biblical text shifts back and forth between Hebrew and English, the music changes from Middle Eastern to that which has a sort of Elizabethan quality to it.

Robinovitch's arrangements for three guitars of four traditional Judeo-Spanish songs, which are both intimate and exotic, make up Part III of Sefarad.

Part V of the CD, titled Rodas Recordada (Rhodes Remembered), has a dramatic story behind it involving the fate of the Jewish community on the Greek island of Rhodes during the Holocaust. This is the first time the piece has been recorded on a CD.

Robinovitch says, "In 1933, a Spanish scholar and writer, Guillermo Diaz-Plaja, went to Rhodes in search of people who spoke an old Ladino dialect. He went to the Sephardic Jewish community of Rhodes, which had been earlier expelled from Spain and still spoke the old Spanish dialect, and he asked Jewish people he met to recite old Spanish ballads.

"There he met a Sephardic Jewish woman, named Mazelto (Mazaltov) de Jacob Israel, and she recited to him The Ballad of Three Doves in her traditional Judeo-Spanish dialect."

Forty years later, Diaz-Plaja, who became a celebrated literary critic, returned to Rhodes and found that there was no Jewish community left there, as in World War II, all but 151 of the 1,673 Jews of Rhodes had been sent to death in Auschwitz. Diaz-Plaja looked for the house of Mazalto de Jacob Israel and wrote a poem about the fate of the Jews of Rhodes, hauntingly interwoven with memories of his first visit and The Ballad of the Three Doves.

As Robinovitch recalls, "In 1979, after I had discovered the poem, I met Diaz- Plaja when I was in Barcelona."

Several years ago, Robinovitch set the poem to music at the request of the Music of Remembrance, an organization in Seattle dedicated to performing music related to the Holocaust.

"The organization researched the Sephardic community in Seattle, and it turned out there were Jews living in Seattle who were Mazelto's relatives. Mazelto had come to New York in 1939. Her grandson, who later had a distinguished career in the U.S. army, met her there and escorted her to Seattle," says Robinovitch.

Robinovitch's Rodas Recordada was performed in Seattle two years ago, and Mazelto's grandson, now an elderly man, was in the audience to hear the song about his grandmother, The Ballad of the Three Doves, and the fate of the Jews of Rhodes.

Bench bosses named for world Jewish tournament

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

It's beginning to look as if Team Canada – the Jewish version, that is – will feature some major league talent behind the bench for next summer's World Jewish Hockey Tournament in Israel.

Organizers are hoping to match that bench strength with on-ice talent, because even at this level, pride demands that Team Canada come home with a gold medal.

Sherry Bassin, director of hockey operations for the Canadian teams, is expecting Canada to win gold at the tournament, which features junior and senior divisions and takes place July 3 to 14, 2009, at Canada Centre in Metulla.

Sherry Bassin

"We're not going to participate. We're going over to win it," he said.

In the first such tournament in 2007, which was limited to senior players, Canada did not even play in the gold-medal game. The United States, stocked with a boatload of National Collegiate Athletic Association (NCAA) players, defeated Israel to claim the championship.

This time around, Team Jewish Canada is recruiting some notable names to spearhead the quest for gold. Former Toronto Maple Leaf Steve Thomas will coach the junior team, while onetime National Hockey League head coach and TSN broadcaster Pierre McGuire is being tabbed to coach a possible second Canadian junior team.

Bassin, who won the 1993 Memorial Cup with the Sault Ste. Marie Greyhounds of the Ontario Hockey League (OHL) and two gold medals with the Canadian World Junior Team (1982 and 1985), will coach the senior team. Sports columnist Steve Simmons will serve as his assistant, as well as director of communications for the tournament.

The Americans, who promise to be strong again in 2009, were led by former NHLer John Anderson to their gold-medal win in 2007. Anderson is currently head coach of the NHL Atlanta Thrashers. Whether he comes back next year remains to be seen, but the Americans have named former NHLer Mike Hartman as the head coach of their junior team.

Israel's senior team will be led by Jean Perron, the head coach who led the Montreal Canadiens to a Stanley Cup victory in 1986, while Phil David, who coached in the English professional league last year and is working with AAA players in Toronto this winter, will coach the Israeli junior entry

Steve Thomas

Four countries competed in the inaugural tournament in 2007: Canada, the United States, Israel and France. All are expected to return, along with perhaps a fifth European entry with players from a number of countries, including Hungary, Simmons said.

Israel, France, the United States and Russia are expected to send under-17 teams and Canada might ice two squads, said Simmons.

Bassin, however, said while that is the goal, logistical considerations – such as practice time – could limit the Canadians to one team. That might mean disappointing some young players, he acknowledged.

The open tryouts for the team proved popular, with players flocking to Toronto last June to bid for a spot, said Simmons.

"We had a large number of kids from around the country. It was hard to pick. There was a lot more talent than expected," many of AAA calibre, said Simmons, who has coached minor hockey in Toronto for more than 20 years.

Thomas, who scored 421 goals in the NHL before retiring in 2004, was recruited to the tournament by Bassin. "It's an unbelievable opportunity… to see a part of the world I've never been to," he said.

"It's an independent tournament that allows these kids to see that part of the world and to rub shoulders with kids from other parts of the world," said Thomas, who's coached the Greater Toronto Hockey League (GTHL) Toronto Marlboros minor midgets for the past three years.

A veteran of four International Ice Hockey Federation (IIHF) World Championships, including a gold-medal win in Milan in 1994, Thomas said, "I'd be able to bring to the table the recognition of what it means to pull a jersey on with Canada on the front of it."

Bassin said organizers hope not just to ice winning teams, but "to create a bond between the kids and Israel. That's our homeland – that's our identity," he said.

Most of last year's squad are excited to return, but Bassin also expects to recruit a number of pros from the American Hockey League, the East Coast Hockey League and in Europe, as well as younger skaters who play in the OHL and NCAA.

Two players likely to be invited include Cory Pecker, who was on Canada's winning Spengler Cup team last year, and Eric Himelfarb, a six-th-round Montreal Canadiens draft pick who's playing in Switzerland.

Much of the tournament is being subsidized, with businessman and philanthropist Sidney Greenberg raising the funds and putting the hockey organization into place. "Without Sid Greenberg, there's no opportunity for these kids," said Bassin. "It doesn't happen."

The importance of pets

By MICHAEL GORDON

The Senior Side of Life

Her name was Shaggy, a suitable name for a large English sheepdog that lived in a small, one-bedroom apartment with my parents, my sister, my grandmother and me during my childhood.

I thought Shaggy was huge, at least she was in relation to me, and I recall snuggling up with her on the floor and her accepting all my attempts at affection, play or mischievousness. She just sat with her lovely eyes and licked her way into everyone's heart.

Years later, a series of "Bingos" – all pups descended from an uncle's dog – were provided to my family for most of my developmental years and long after my grandmother's death. We also, at one point, had a cat that my sister brought in from the street. I never thought in those days about the critical importance of animals in family life or, in particular, in the life of elders.

In my third year of medical school in Dundee, Scotland, I moved, with my roommate, Steve, into a terrace apartment, a fourth-floor walk-up, owned by a grey-haired, wiry Scottish woman, Mrs. Jenny Dykes. It was clear from the moment that we were interviewed by Jenny, that Judy, her terrier, would be playing a role in our collective living arrangement.

Jenny, whose high-frequency and high-decibel voice often uttered the name "Judy" when she was coaxing her into the kitchen for breakfast or downstairs for her walk, was a focal point of much of the apartment's activities. Jenny had many unique attributes, one of which was to be able to hold a cigarette between her lips, and talk, cook and bake while the ash grew to the length of the whole cigarette, apparently without it falling off. However, we were reluctant to partake of her baked goods when she offered them to us, even though her shortbread was quite tasty.

Over the two years that we lived with Jenny, we began, as quasi-family, to help out with Judy's care – mainly with her late-night walk, as in the winter months it was dark and usually wet outside, and we both knew that Jenny – although devoted to Judy – was somewhat frail and shaky, which made walking up and down the four floors challenging.

One day as Steve and I entered the flat, we heard another dog's yapping – and there she was, a smaller version of Judy, a puppy that Jenny decided was necessary to keep her and Judy company and to prepare for Judy's eventual demise.

Steve and I moved out in our final year of school, but we continued to visit Jenny and the dogs from time to time. Our association with Jenny and her menagerie was quite positive. At times, we would meet Jenny walking the two dogs in the neighborhood.

One day on one of our visits to Jenny, Judy's bark did not greet us – she had been put down the previous week. Jenny expressed great sadness to us as she picked up the new pup, and they nuzzled each other affectionately. Many years later, after Steve and I had graduated and left Dundee, we heard that Jenny died, and we remembered her and her dogs with great fondness.

Jenny, like many older people, needed her pets to fill the place in the human heart for love, affection and companionship that cannot always be filled by other people.

Pets are wonderful, and many older people benefit greatly from their companionship and the uncompromising affection that they provide. They many not be for everyone, but when the match works, it can be magical.

What does 'secular' mean today?

Seymour Epstein

This column is emphatically not a critique of secular Judaism. I have no battle with that stream of Jewish life, but I do wish to do battle with the common use of the word "secular."

For instance, people refer to the secular portion of a day school curriculum when they are actually talking about general studies. Or, using the Israeli terminology, folks talk of religious Jews (dati'im in Hebrew) and secular Jews (chilonim).

But even in contemporary Israel, the secular designation is being reconsidered as surveys reveal how many "secular" Israelis light candles on Erev Shabbat, keep kosher, have a mezuzah on their door and celebrate religious holidays. By the way, the same reconsideration is given to the term "religious" when surveys reveal certain irregularities in that designation.

Yes, there are truly secular Israelis who, with deep knowledge of our literature, values, and history, reject Judaism as a religion, do not believe in God and strive to find a national, cultural, and historical appreciation of Jewish peoplehood. They were once great in numbers, but I think their numbers have decreased dramatically.

They exist in Israel, and they exist in the various Diasporas. However, the great majority of Jews who are labelled secular, are not. They have not made a conscious rejection of a religious value system, primarily because they do not know that system. They may be uninterested, ignorant, indifferent or even disaffected, but they aren't attempting to build a new form of Jewish life without God and religion, as others once did.

Both in the Diaspora and Israel of the 21st century, it's especially important to recognize this difference, since the various religious denominations are spiritual movements of great diversity, and not adhering to one of them does not necessarily imply secularism.

Why is making the distinction important? First, so that we can understand each other. Not belonging to a synagogue does not mean that one is secular and that a secular setting will fill a need. There are secular organizations in our midst, and they are not over-subscribed.

If caring and welcoming Jews wish to deal with indifference and disaffection, they must re-think their categories.

Epi (Seymour Epstein) is the vice-president of Jewish Education at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Meanderings on my heart attack

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

I had a heart attack on July 18. A moment before, everything was fine.

July 18 was a normal day; everything was shipshape and Bristol fashion. That was the tricky part. An instant before my heart attack, I was laughing. One hour later, an ambulance, sirens blaring, was rushing me to the hospital.

I constantly wonder about this riddle – the moment before, the moment during and that which comes afterward. If I am hugging my son, Noah River, at 6:30 p.m., which I was, and at 6:31 my heart went under attack, and the following moment was the beginning of me changing forever, how am I to live life? If we don't know what surprise is waiting for us around the bend, how are we to latch onto the present? How is it possible not to fall into a well of fatalism or fear? God created a mystery and called it life.

I had a heart attack on July 18. It hurt.

I will always remember the look on my mother's face immediately following my angioplasty. Never had I seen such great concern directed at me, one that said, "You are my son and I wasn't ready to lose you." Never before I have seen so many I know and love looking back at me with brows creased and eyes squinting with worry. Only then did I begin to feel fretful about my situation, realizing Avrum Rosensweig, 48, – me – was a patient in the cardiac care unit (CCU) and the cardio machines beeping incessantly were connected to my body. We worry more about others.

Before leaving the CCU, I was wheeled around by a student volunteer. I remember thinking, "When I was young, heart attacks were for grandparents." I looked at the men and women lying in the CCU beds. They appeared so fragile and vulnerable. They were my mirror. One man was well coiffed and had a look of fortune about him. But he was hunkered over with oxygen tubes coming out of his nose. Why, I considered, did the Pharaohs have themselves buried in a sarcophagus with their gem-studded statues? A sickly, dying or diseased body finds no meaning in gold and silver.

July 18. A new narrative.

Ask me a question about my life, and I will respond, "Pre- or post-Heart Attack?" Was my heart attack a blessing, as people said it would be, allowing me the opportunity to rest and rebuild after a few rough personal and professional years? I am beginning to see that lining, yes. The movement of one foot in front of the other, walking, is so much more relevant. I love those I loved, harder. Life, however, is more puzzling.

Thank you for your caring, well-wishes, and the messages that said you missed my column. Knowing I was missed is part of my recovery. Everyone has their angels. Mine are my mother who says tfillin for me every day; Michael who saved my life; Miriam who was always by my side; my sisters and families who took care of me in their homes; all my patient colleagues and volunteers, especially at Ve'ahavta, the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian & Relief Committee, who showed that the organization is bigger than me; the medical personnel at Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre; loved ones and friends; and Noah River, whose antics and little-boy Godliness makes me laugh and hope, which, according to shtetl medical care, is a refuah (a medicine). I am blessed!

Take care of yourself. Eat well and walk a lot. Visit the sick, if they want visitors. Love! On July 18, I had a heart attack. Moments before, everything seemed fine.

Make Shoah study mandatory: poll

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — While seven per cent of Canadians say they've never heard of the Holocaust, a recent national survey also found that 75 per cent think the subject should be compulsory in school, and it suggested there's a link between Holocaust knowledge and "sensitivity" to diversity.

Conducted by Leger Marketing from Oct. 8 to 10, the poll, released in Montreal on the 70th anniversary of Kristallnacht, questioned 1,500 Canadians on 25 Holocaust-related issues. The margin of error was 3.9 per cent, 19 times out of 20.

The survey was described by Jack Jedwab, director of the Montreal-based Association for Canadian Studies (ACS), which commissioned it, as one of the most extensive ever in examining how informed Canadians are about the Holocaust and their attitudes towards it.

"This is very, very detailed," he said at a press conference last week.

The survey, perhaps not unpredictably, revealed a correlation between age and education and Holocaust knowledge. Younger Canadians said they were less knowledgeable about the Holocaust than older ones, with similar results, respectively, for the less and more educated.

The survey also showed a gap along linguistic lines. Twelve per cent of francophones said they had never heard of the Holocaust, compared with four per cent of English-speakers. Francophones were also less likely to have "strong knowledge" of the Holocaust, possibly, Jedwab told the media, because of a "historic narrative" in Quebec vis-à-vis World War II and the issue of conscription, to which there was significant opposition in the province.

Overall, people from Quebec and Saskatchewan reported having the least knowledge of the Holocaust.

For Jedwab, the more significant conclusions were those related to the issue of diversity.

The goods news was that 58 per cent of Canadians agreed that anti-Semitism is a problem, and 59 per cent agreed that society should try harder to accept the customs and traditions of minority religious groups.

On the other hand, almost one-third of Canadians said they believe that society is threatened by the influx of non-Christian immigrants, and 41 per cent think immigrants should give up their customs and traditions and "become more like the majority."

Prof held in 1980 Paris shul bombing

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

OTTAWA — The RCMP arrested a University of Ottawa sociology professor last week in connection with the 1980 bombing that killed four people and wounded more than 20 others outside a Paris synagogue.

Hassan Diab, 55, was taken into custody at his home in Gatineau, Que., last Thursday.

The RCMP said the arrest was made by members of a Canadian anti-terrorism team co-operating with a French investigation, carrying out a provisional arrest warrant under Canada's Extradition Act.

"This is a French investigation," RCMP Cpl. Jean Hainey said. "The RCMP was simply providing assistance under the Mutual Legal Assistance Treaty."

The bombing on Oct. 3, 1980, outside the Copernic Road Synagogue in Paris, killed three French men and a young Israeli woman.

The bomb was placed in a bag attached to a motorbike that was parked outside the synagogue in the posh 16th district of Paris.

The bomb exploded minutes before a crowd of people were due to emerge from the shul on a Friday night, at the start of Shabbat.

No group claimed responsibility, but according to the French newspaper L'Express, French investigators suspect the bombing was organized by a small Palestinian militant group that was at odds with Yasser Arafat's Palestine Liberation Organization.

A now-defunct group, the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine – Special Operations, was eventually blamed for the attack.

CJC Backs Lesbians

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress expressed support last week for a lesbian couple in Oshawa, Ont., who were punched by a 43-year-old man in a school parking lot while their kids watched. The women were picking up their three children on Nov. 3 when they were attacked by a father who called them "f---ing dyke lesbians" and punched them both in the face, the couple said last week. Both women needed treatment in hospital. The man was charged with assault, but the women want him to face hate crimes charges. "In our multicultural society, it's important for us to speak up in solidarity with other minority groups," said Fredelle Brief, chair of CJC's community relations committee. She said police should "give strong consideration to the possibility that this attack was motivated by hate."

High Heel Vice?

TORONTO — A mosque advising several Somali women in a Canadian Human Rights Commission complaint has posted material online attacking westerners as wicked and Jewish women as the corrupting and evil influence behind high heel shoes. The Toronto Star reported last week that the Khalid Bin Al-Walid Mosque in the city's west end posted the slurs in a teaching section of its website. Eight Somali women allege the courier company UPS violated their human rights by forbidding them from wearing full-length skirts. UPS says the skirts violate safety rules. The women say the mosque backs up their claim that Islam requires them to dress modestly in the skirts.

Delivery Man Killed

NEW YORK — A man delivering meals on wheels for a Jewish charity organization was fatally shot Nov. 10 in New York City. Emanuel Aminov, 55, a Russian immigrant who had worked only three months for the Jewish Association for Services for the Aged, was shot in the chest after making a delivery to a Brooklyn housing project, police said. The father of three died later in hospital. The shooter, who fled and remains at large, was described as a man in his 20s wearing a black hooded sweatshirt. Aminov's wallet was found empty near his body, leading police to suspect robbery as a motive.

Emanuel Apologizes

NEW YORK — Rahm Emanuel apologized to an Arab-American group for his father's disparaging remarks about Arabs. "From the fullness of my heart, I personally apologize on behalf of my family and me," Emanuel, president-elect Barack Obama's chief of staff, said by phone to Mary Rose Oakar, president of the American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee. In an interview with Israel's Ma'ariv daily, Benjamin Emanuel said of his son: "Obviously, he'll influence the president to be pro-Israel. Why wouldn't he? What is he, an Arab? He's not going to be mopping floors at the White House."

Print Edition Folds

NEW YORK — The children's magazine Babaganewz will cease its print edition. Amir Cohen, CEO of the non-profit group JFL Media, which publishes Babaganewz, said the magazine will go to an online-only format. One of JFL's flagship publications, it was published eight times a year and received several awards from the American Jewish Press Association. As part of the move, JFL cut nine members of Babaganewz's 21-member staff. Cohen said the move wasn't strictly financial, but the economic situation was a factor. JFL, which also publishes the Jewish teen mag JVibe, has slashed its budget in half over the past year. The other publications would continue as they are, Cohen said.

Hospital Sues to Remove Life Support

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A Washington, D.C., hospital is suing for the right to remove a 12-year-old Orthodox Jewish boy from life support.

The National Children's Medical Center says Motl Brody of Brooklyn, who was diagnosed with a severe form of brain cancer, is brain dead. But his parents, Eluzer and Miriam Brody, say someone whose brain activity has ceased is not considered dead under Jewish law. The boy still has circulatory and respiratory function, with mechanical and other assistance, the Washington Post reported.

The hospital says in court filings that "scarce resources are being used for the preservation of a dead body" and treating him is "offensive to good medical ethics." Doctors had removed Brody from a ventilator and he made no respiratory efforts.

A court hearing in the dispute was to be held Monday.

The case echoes one earlier this year in which an 84-year-old Orthodox man in Winnipeg died before a court could rule if a hospital had the right to take him off life support after his family sued to force doctors to keep treating him. Doctors said he had minimal brain function. The case sparked a nationwide debate on whether doctors or family members have the right to make the final decision to remove life support in end-of-life cases.

Breakaway group launches Conservative shul council

USCJ 'saddened' by move

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The new Canadian Council of Conservative Synagogues (CCCS) consists of four Toronto congregations – Adath Israel Congregation, Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, Beth Tzedec Congregation and Beth Sholom Synagogue – but as its name implies, organizers hope to expand its purview.

The member congregations, with the exception of Beth Sholom, were affiliated with the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism's Canadian region until earlier this year. They left the New York-based group, which is the umbrella body for about 700 Conservative congregations in North America, following votes by their respective boards.

All three shuls cited issues regarding the service of local needs by the USCJ. As well, Adath Israel noted growing theological differences between itself and the Conservative movement in the United States, where synagogues tend to be less traditional in practice and where the Conservative movement's Jewish Theological Seminary has begun to admit openly gay students to its rabbinical program.

"We're not in competition with USCJ," said Harvey Schiller, the immediate past president of Beth Emeth and now co-chair of CCCS along with Eric Gossin. "We had an alternative vision for moving forward the cause of Conservative Judaism."

He sees the new council as a more "grassroots" organization that will focus on needs in each local community.

Harvey Schiller

But Paul Kochberg, president of the USCJ's Canadian region, said he remains "deeply saddened" by the withdrawal of USCJ's three largest Toronto congregations, and by the initiative to create the new organization.

He said that the synagogues' decision, which leaves only four USCJ-affiliated synagogues in the Toronto area, "has deeply affected our regional operating budget." He noted that the central USCJ organization is providing "very considerable" financial support to the region. The funding has facilitated the hiring of a new interim regional executive director, Howard Goldberg.

USCJ membership fees, which are based on congregational size, can run to more than $40,000 annually per synagogue.

Kochberg added that Canadian region synagogues outside the GTA have committed to remaining in the USCJ. The organization provides services such as clergy placement and participation in United Synagogue Youth, which offers regional and international conventions as well as Israel programs.

Young people from non-USCJ synagogues are not able to belong to USY, unless they join a chapter in a synagogue that is USCJ-affiliated. "Anyone who is familiar with the USY program will know what a great loss this is," both for the congregations and the young people, Kochberg said.

An inaugural CCCS event for high school students ended up being cancelled, but organizers are planning future youth programs. An adult education event is planned for January, and a speaker at a December meeting will discuss ways of developing volunteerism within the shuls, and will work with member shuls individually, said Loretta Tanenbaum, executive director of the new entity.

Schiller said the council has begun reaching out to synagogues across the country.

THE LEBANON WAR IS OVER BUT THE BATTLE CONTINUES...

"If I had to lose my eyesight, so that my friends could return home from Lebanon safely, I can live with that."

Amit Bar'el, his wife Efrat and daughter Lior

During the Second Lebanon War, an anti-tank missile exploded in front of Amit Bar'el. Both of his eyes were crushed. When his wife Efrat reached the hospital in Haifa, she learned that Amit was in critical condition and undergoing surgery. That was two years ago. Tragically, Amit's eyesight is gone — but he's alive. He and his family are so deeply grateful for that.

Ask him what he misses most about losing his sight and he'll tell you that it's seeing his little daughters, Lior and Ziv. He can still hear them and hug them. But he'll never "see" them grow into young women, and that breaks his heart.

Amit sees life as a glass half full and tries to always find the good in every situation. Among the most important of those good things is Beit Halochem Tel Aviv. This is where Amit goes regularly for a variety of therapy and sport activities that help him strengthen his body and learn how to navigate in his new world. Amit and his family are able to spend time with other families who are also rebuilding their lives. They encourage and support one another. When you ask Amit what has made his recovery possible, he will tell you first and foremost the love of his family, and then Beit Halochem.

Unique magnetic pull

From the editor's desk

From the earliest grades in school, we learn that the earth has two magnetic poles: the north and the south. The pointing pin of any compass orients us geographically according to the pull of those respective poles.

But there is another pole on earth that is the source of another, unique, utterly distinct magnetic tug: Jerusalem.

Jerusalem has the ability to orient us religiously, spiritually, historically and even personally. To be sure, we all react in our own ways to the lode's special lure.

But we do all react.

This varied reaction can be seen in the mere fact of the numbers of people who travel to Jerusalem from all over the world.

Thus, it was last week on a Monday morning early in November that there were thousands of visitors at Yad Vashem, the Holocaust Martyrs' and Heroes' Remembrance Authority, which sits solemnly and ever so appropriately on the Mount of Remembrance in the western slopes of Jerusalem.

Every time I visit Jerusalem, I visit Yad Vashem. As many readers will know, I have often written about Yad Vashem in this space. And, as many readers will also know, there is always something to write about Yad Vashem.

I have never been to Yad Vashem when the wind has not breezed in soft, sighing whispers through the countless trees on the mountain.

The sheer physical beauty of the place is itself a sanctuary from the noisy traffic and from life's more mundane daily matters merely metres away. The museums, memorials and monuments interweave with the greenery and the foliage in respectful, esthetic harmony. Indeed, many of the trees are themselves memorials to the thousands of courageous non-Jews who risked their lives and the lives of their families by sheltering Jews from harm's way during World War II.

With relatively little time available that morning to be on the mountain and with the wide-eyed, innocent, tiny faces of far-away grandchildren accompanying me, I walked directly to the Children's Memorial.

The memorial is a testament to man's brilliance and to mankind's determination and ability to express the inexpressible.

Designed by Moshe Safdie, the museum is a single chamber carved out of a cavern in the hillside. It enshrines the tradition that the inner blue light of a candle flame is akin to the soul of a human being.

The chamber is without illumination. But it is not without light.

The light in the room is the sum of an infinity of pinpoint candle flickers, the "lights" of the souls of the nearly 1.5 million children who were murdered by the Nazis and their accomplices.

The visitor walks on a raised platform around the circumference of the chamber peering into and surrounded by a vast starry firmament of children's souls. With understated, plaintive reverence, the names of murdered children, their ages and countries of origin are anonymously recited in the darkened background.

One wishes to reach upward, to touch, to caress, to retrieve one of the stars to begin to fill the infinite voids here on earth. But that is impossible, a sorrowful, aching reminder of how limited our ability is to protect our children.

One emerges from the Children's Museum, the chamber of children's souls, onto Janusz Korczak Square.

The sunlight is an ethereal curtain separating the museum from the square. The focal point of the square is a sculpture by Boris Saktsier that stands at the centre of a wall made from Jerusalem stone dedicated to Dr. Janusz Korczak.

Korczak's real name was Henrik Goldshmidt. He ran an orphanage in the Warsaw Ghetto, where he refused to abandon the children in his care. He and some 200 orphans were sent to Treblinka on Aug. 5, 1942.

The sculpture is of a cluster of 12 children, their expressions downcast, their eyes fallen in stark sadness. Korczak, larger than life, is at the centre of the cluster, his left hand reaching across the sheaf of young boys, enveloping them in an embrace of love, if not, alas, of security.

As I sit in the sun on a low, stone retaining wall facing the monument, a group of nearly 50 visitors emerges from the Children's Museum.

The visitors, like the majority of visitors I observed that morning, were not Jewish. They appeared to be from Scandinavia.

They stopped in front of the monument and en masse began to recite a prayer. I recognized the language.

They were from Poland.

After 10 minutes, the prayer ended. They moved on silently, to another place on the mountain. The last person in the group, a woman, perhaps in her mid-30s, sobbed audibly.

Yad Vashem is part of gravity that tugs at us from Jerusalem. From there, we went to the Kotel, the Western Wall.

We all react in our own ways to the magnetic pull of Jerusalem, the city that, unlike the north and south pole, commands a compass that lies nestled within a personal and private terrain.

–MBD

See]N CELEBRATING 60 YEARS OF ISRAEL

HISTORIC KNESSET MOMENT

On Nov. 20, 1977, Egyptian President Anwar Sadat addressed the Israeli Knesset. In an unprecedented and dramatic diplomatic step that took most observers by surprise, Sadat flew to Israel and met with a non-partisan cross-section of Israeli leaders. His visit was cheered by the Israeli public. In his Knesset address, Sadat was forthright: "You want to live with us, in this part of the world. In all sincerity, I tell you we welcome you among us with full security and safety. This in itself is a tremendous turning point, one of the landmarks of a decisive historical change. We used to reject you. We had our reasons and our fears, yes… Today, through my visit to you, I ask, why don't we stretch out our hands with faith and sincerity…? Why don't we stand together with the courage of men and the boldness of heroes who dedicate themselves to a sublime aim? Why don't we stand together with the same courage and daring to erect a huge edifice of peace?" Seated to Sadat's right is Yitzhak Shamir, who would later become Israel's prime minister.

Israel's brand needs work: consul general

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Israel has failed to break into the top 10 of the Country Brand Index, a ranking compiled by FutureBrand, a consulting firm based in New York.

Australia topped the list as the top country brand, followed by Canada, the United States and Italy. The results were based on the views of 2,700 business and leisure travellers. Countries were ranked on their ability to generate positive global recognition and attract travellers and tourists.

In a thumbnail description of Canada, which improved from sixth to second place, FutureBrand's experts said, "Canada is an exceptional country and has all the assets to be a great brand: natural and urban beauty, quality of life, diversity, culture, entertainment, gastronomy, business infrastructure, stability and openness."

Israel's only mention in the index was as one of top five country brands for history. It was joined by Egypt, Italy, France and Greece in a Mediterranean sweep of the category.

Israel's absence from the top ranks of the overall brand came as no surprise to Amir Gissin, Israel's Toronto-based consul-general. He and colleagues in the Israeli Foreign Ministry have been pushing the government for several years to embark on a program to improve the country's international image.

"Israel is seen as one of the worst brands," Gissin acknowledged last week. The country is often associated with conflict and violence but Gissin is convinced that with a concerted effort, Canadians will come to see the other side of Israel – its passion and creativity as well as its ability to fuse disparate qualities, such as old and new, holy and "earthy," east and west.

Gissin announced the launch of a new branding effort last summer. The process should take some time to roll out, but so far, 20 billboards, mostly located downtown, have been erected, with 20 more to follow beginning this week. "They're not going up around Bathurst," he said, but in Mississauga, Markham, downtown Toronto, Chinatown, west Eglinton and other neighbourhoods.

Amir Gissin

They will extol Israel's virtues and try to get Canadians to think of the country as one that is relevant for them.

Beside the billboards, the consulate, which operates on a public relations budget of less than $30,000, has tried to leverage Israel's brand with less costly measures. Israeli artists are being invited to Toronto "and we take them not to where you meet the usual suspects." Gissin pointed to an Ethiopian-born actor who walked to Sudan before finally arriving in Israel. The actor performed in a Toronto high school largely populated by Somali students where they shared the immigration experience, he said.

An Israeli rock band, Knissiat Hasechel, recently performed in a Roman Catholic school in Richmond Hill and "for many of the kids, it was their first exposure to Israelis ever." The event didn't focus on politics, but on music, something exciting and relevant to their lives, he said.

Gissin pointed to other cultural and sports programs on tap, including an international Jewish hockey tournament in Israel next summer, which he expected would attract the attention of the Canadian sports media.

Gissin is getting personally involved in the effort to showcase a different side of Israel. He'll be the guest on Canadian Sportfishing, a program that airs on TSN Saturday mornings. The show was recorded during the summer in the Bay of Quinte, during which Gissin fished while talking "about the new face of Israel.

"One million Canadians watch this show. You can imagine the profile of the people looking at it. They do not deal with Israel. It's not important for them."

The show, he continued will offer the opportunity to present a positive image of Israel.

The index, which was released in London at the World Travel Market, identified China, the United Arab Emirates and Croatia as the top three rising stars most likely to become major tourist destinations in the next five years.

"In this our fourth year, it is exciting to see many countries embracing the idea of brand," said Rina Plapler, senior executive director of FutureBrand. "However, we still feel this is a largely undeveloped category with most countries continuing to promote and market themselves in ways that are not differentiated. Particularly in the coming years, country brands must improve both their strategic orientation as well as their delivery."

While Gissin did not give too much credence to the report – he called it subjective and "far from being scientific" – "we are aware that Israel is not a strong brand. We won't change that just by ads and PR tools, but by trying to change Israel from a single-dimensional brand to a more multi-dimensional brand of who we are.

"We know for a fact that Israel is a fun place to go. It has a lot to offer tourists and investors. Our challenge, is to show that in Toronto."

Bag of deadly tricks

The ceasefire that came into effect last summer between Israel and Hamas officially expires on Dec. 19. It may have already run its course. On Sunday, three rockets were fired into the Negev. The Israeli Air Force struck at a mortar launching crew of Palestinians, killing four. Earlier in the weekend Palestinian terrorists sent some 17 Qassam, Katyusha and Grad rockets at Sderot and Ashkelon. Hamas claimed credit for the action. Thankfully, no one was killed in any of the barrages.

Hamas claimed the rocket barrage was in retaliation for Israeli actions in the area. The claim, however, is spurious – brazenly so.

The terrorist organization, which also happens to rule Gaza, has recently increased its military activities near the border with Israel. Earlier in the month, it was caught digging a tunnel toward the Jewish state underneath the security fence, which Israeli officials determined was the precursor to an attempted kidnapping of Israeli soldiers. An IDF force entered the Gaza Strip to thwart Hamas' plans. In the ensuing action, six Israeli soldiers were wounded, two of them seriously. Eleven Hamas terrorists were killed, and a number of operatives were wounded.

Digging tunnels under the Gaza border is now a growth industry. It is especially so along the Gazan-Egyptian border, where scrutiny is less rigorous and the border more inviting. Some reports suggested that as many as 1,000 such tunnels may already be in operation.

But the tunnels are only one component of the deadly plotting underway by Hamas against the Jewish state.

According to the Intelligence and Terrorism Information Center in Israel, as of Nov. 7, 81 rockets (19 of which fell inside the Gaza Strip) and 36 mortar shells had been fired at Israel since the June "ceasefire." The rocket barrage last weekend has raised the tally to more than 100.

Following the rocket attacks against the Negev communities earlier in the month, Israel closed the commercial crossings into Gaza on Nov. 6. The resulting hardship for the Palestinian citizens evoked harsh condemnation of Israel by the director of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestinian Refugees (UNRWA), John Ging. UN Secretary General Ban Ki-Moon and the EU Commissioner for External Affairs, Benita Ferra-Waldner, urged Israel to re-open the crossings, which by this writing it had done in part.

But what is Israel to do to defend its citizens short of invading the Gaza Strip?

It cannot and must not allow a situation in which Hamas feels it is safe to sporadically bomb the people of the Negev without fear of retaliation by Israel. It is inconceivable that Israeli citizens should fear for their lives, yet Gazans bear no commercial or other trading consequences for the policies of their leaders.

With Israeli elections less than three months away, Hamas leaders, masters of propaganda sleight of hand, have again reached into their bag of deadly tricks. They risk a return to the violence of some six months ago. Or perhaps they crave it.

Universalize Holocaust Education Week

Toronto's Holocaust Education Week was great in immortalizing those who died in the Holocaust and those who survived to tell their stories. However, part of the purpose of remembering the Holocaust is to prevent it from happening again. It has to become part of tikkun olam. Holocaust Education Week was presented by Jews, about Jews and for Jews. It did not reach out to the wider community. It should have included the experiences of the Armenians, those who survived Rwanda, those from Darfur, and other religious and non-religious groups that have undergone their own holocausts, including some of Canada's native peoples. For the world to benefit from the memory of the Holocaust, the universalization of the event and the idea of tikkun olam must be integral parts of Holocaust Education Week.

Reaching out to other communities

I was pleasantly surprised and elated that the Jewish community in Toronto has reached out, in a tangible way, to a new and different community ("Jews, Somalis launch mentoring program," CJN, Nov. 6).

For the past 12 years, Jewish Family Services (JFS) of Ottawa and the Somali Centre for Family Services have been working together. JFS and the Somali Centre built a relationship with the Carleton School of Social Work to identify and train nearly a dozen candidates from within the Somali community as social workers. They have since graduated and work within the Ottawa social service network.

We have also begun to work with other Ottawa ethnic communities to broaden diverse services in order to meet the needs of the Arabic-speaking, Chinese and Haitian communities, to name but a few. Currently, our JFS staff includes Arabs and Muslims who reach out to their communities and, at the same time, break down the animosity between Jews and Arabs.

Building relationships with all communities is of the utmost importance. The only way for the barriers built by prejudices and hatred to crumble away is by offering our assistance, expertise, experience and friendship as Jews.

Jews in the Canadian military

The history of the Jews in the Canadian military and of their exploits and experiences dispels the myth that Jews have not contributed their share in the Canadian Armed Forces. This includes the Boer War (1899-1902), World War I (1914-1918), World War II (1939-1945) and the Korean War (1950-1953), as well as Canada's ongoing peacekeeping activities throughout the world.

Since 1759, when it is documented that Jews fought with Gen. James Wolfe, members of the Jewish community have participated in every significant conflict that has involved Canada. In the past century, Canadian Jewry, along with the rest of the Allies, under the shadow of the Holocaust, helped liberate Europe.

The Canadian Jewish Military Museum, which has a display at the Lipa Green Building at 4600 Bathurst St. in Toronto, pays everlasting tribute to the thousands of Jewish men and women in the Canadian military who helped foil the Nazis' plans to kill the remaining Jews in the death and labour camps. Established in 2000, the museum houses a large variety of war memorabilia that has been donated throughout the years. Additionally, it is home to a Memorial Book of Remembrance, honouring the more than 550 Jewish Canadian Armed Forces personnel who gave their lives during duty.

The archives of the Jewish Canadian Military Museum, at the Toronto Zionist Centre, 788 Marlee Ave., Suite 308, preserve our history and educate the public about the Jewish role in the Canadian Armed Forces. The website address of the museum is www.jcmm.ca. For more information, call Al Reuben at 416-720-1465.

Endless appeals for undesirables

Killing squad interpreter Helmut Oberlander immigrated to Canada in 1954, lied on his immigration application and has been successfully fighting attempts to deport him since 1995 ("Court rules against killing squad member," CJN, Nov. 6). A justice system that allows for a seemingly endless appeals process provides no justice at all. It is for this reason that Canada holds such great appeal for undesirables such as Oberlander and Mahmoud Mohammad Issa Mohammad. Mohammad is a Palestinian terrorist who shot up an El Al airliner in 1968 and murdered a passenger. He was convicted in a Greek court and sentenced to 17 years in prison. He was freed the following year when another group of Palestinians hijacked a Greek plane and threatened to blow it up unless the Greek government set him free.

Lithuania asks partisans to 'justify' their actions

By ADAM FUERSTENBERG

Holocaust survivors, and veterans everywhere, are anxiously and apprehensively following Lithuania's current attempt to pursue elderly partisans who fought the Nazis under Soviet direction during the German occupation of Lithuania.

What makes the Lithuanian chief prosecutor's pre-trial investigation suspect is that the partisans targeted are almost all Jews. As The Economist commented in an article on Aug. 21, this "investigation" is all the more atrocious since "Lithuania's record on prosecuting war criminals of the other stripe has been spotty, to put it mildly." Among the partisans on the list of witnesses was Sara Ginaite, a retired University of Vilnius political economist now residing in Toronto.

Adam Fuerstenberg

The prosecution alleges that in one of the military actions at the end of January 1941 conducted by anti-Nazi partisans in the Rudnicky forest, in the village of Koniuchy (Koniukai), 38 villagers were unjustifiably killed by the partisans. However, there is no evidence of a "war crime" at Koniuchy. In fact, to give one example of the sloppiness of these allegations, Ginaite was not even in the vicinity of the village when this military action occurred.

Sara Ginaite was born in Kaunas (Kovno) and found herself imprisoned in the Kovno ghetto when the Germans occupied Lithuania after their attack on Russia in June 1941. Still an adolescent, she joined the Kovno Jewish resistance, and shortly after that a partisan detachment in the forests. Among her assignments was to return to the Kovno ghetto to bring Jews out of the ghetto to the forests. In fact, as she makes clear in her prize-winning history/memoir, Resistance and Survival (Mosaic Press, 2005), she was on just such a mission in Kovno when the Koniuchy action occurred.

Sara Ginaite lost almost all her extended family in the Holocaust. Following the war and advanced education, she was a distinguished professor at Vilnius University, publishing 10 books in her field of political economy and on the Holocaust. In the early 1980s, she emigrated to Canada and taught at York University. Two more books followed in Toronto.

She is understandably upset at the Lithuanian prosecutor's attempt to investigate the elderly partisans. Early this August, she wrote a letter to the prosecutor, Rimvydas Valentukevicius, politely explaining her view of these allegations and objecting to this unjustified and unwarranted investigation. She wanted to clarify the cause and circumstance of the tragic event in Koniuchy, although she herself had not been in the Rudnicky forest when the action occurred.

In his answer, Valentukevicius wrote: "Most likely some try to justify it as the fight against fascism. Justification of this action can be presented by those whose conscience is dirty, and the burdens of guilt and responsibility, the danger of being exposed, even after 65 years, forced them to justify their so-called idealized activity, hoping that by attaching themselves to real fighters against the Nazis, they will be freed of responsibility for their activity whose cruelty oversteps the limits of human behaviour."

I guess that in writing about "those" and "some," the prosecutor had in mind anti-Nazi partisans, as well as those critical of the investigation.

Yet, as The Economist explained, in Lithuania during World War II, "Jews' only chance of survival was to fight alongside Soviet-backed partisan groups."

In an interview, Sara Ginaite was willing to give an insight into what happened and the possible motivation of the Lithuanian prosecutor's office.

Fuerstenberg: As a respected former professor at Vilnius University you have friends in intellectual circles there whom you visit regularly almost every summer. Now you tell me that you decided not to go this year. Why?

Sara Ginaite: I cancelled my long-planned and regular summer trip to Lithuania on the advice of an attorney in Vilnius. I was informed (by a reliable source) that my name is on the list of Jewish anti-Nazi partisans whom the Lithuanian prosecutor is investigating in the current campaign to cast aspersions on those Holocaust survivors who joined the anti-Nazi partisans in the forests during the war. The prosecutor seems to have taken the names on the list from my books and other partisans' memoirs. However, months went by, yet there were no specific accusations (nor could there be!), nor was there any exoneration or notice of closing of the investigation. Instead, new names were being added for possible "interviews" (they even had the gall to send the list to Israel's attorney general for possible assistance in locating some of the named). This "process" soon elicited a series of open letters from the Jewish community in Lithuania, as well as articles in major publications like Ha'aretz, the English Forward, the Manchester Guardian, the Economist and others.

Finally, I decided to write a polite letter to the prosecutor to explain that we fought with the partisans out of desperation and to defeat an enemy of democracy and of Lithuania. The reply I received included reiteration of the need for the "investigation" and the "interviews."

Fuerstenberg: I know that you wrote in your memoir/history, Resistance and Survival, about some military actions by partisans, but what do you know about the village of Koniuchy?

Ginaite: The Lithuanian prosecutors allege that at the end of January 1944, in a military operation conducted by the Soviet partisans against residents of Koniuchy, a village about 40 kilometres from Vilnius in the Rudnicky forest area, 38 villagers were killed. Now, a number of elderly Jewish partisans alleged to have participated in this action are being investigated as suspects or witnesses.

Sara Ginaite

In order to survive in the forest and fight the enemy, we had to collect food wherever we could, often from hostile villagers, but we tried as far as possible to seize food from German storage areas or from transports headed for Germany. But we didn't always have the luxury to choose.

The villagers in Koniuchy had a record of hostility to the partisans and attacked us whenever we passed the vicinity of the village. They organized an armed group to fight the partisans, were supplied with weapons by the Germans, and collaborated with the Nazis and the local police. At the end of December 1943, during a food-gathering assignment in a village close to Koniuchy, we were spotted and attacked by the villagers. During the battle, two of our partisans were killed and a third was captured and handed over to the Nazi-controlled police.

A month later the partisans decided to conduct a military operation against the villagers. At the time, I was not in the Rudnicky forest, but I would like to stress that the villagers were not unarmed civilians, but rather collaborators and combatants against Soviet partisans.

Today, Koniuchy is being turned into a "monument," of alleged atrocities committed by Jewish partisans against the innocent villagers. Lithuanian tourist guides offer tours to the village, where tourists are often given misleading accounts of the event.

The guides, of course, don't mention the 239 Jewish communities completely destroyed, nor the 200 Jewish mass graves spread over the Lithuanian countryside. Nearly every former shtetl had its own "pit" where Jews were mercilessly murdered. Nor do the guides mention the killing site in Ponar (Paneriai) where 70,000 Jewish men, women and children, all civilians, were butchered; or the infamous Ninth Fort where in a single day (Oct. 29, 1941), 9,200 Jews were brutally massacred, among them over 4,000 children. These were killings of civilians, not village battles, where, regrettably, villagers were occasional casualties.

During the two periods of Lithuania's Soviet occupation (1940-41 and 1944-91), over 74,500 Lithuanian citizens perished, including Jews, Russians, Poles and others, but mostly Lithuanians. Many more were oppressed. Lithuanians, including many who saved Jews, were also killed by the Nazis. Drawing attention to the military actions of Jewish partisans under Soviet direction and atrocities committed against Lithuanians during the Soviet occupations may be an attempt to create a kind of "equivalency" of suffering.

Fuerstenberg: What do you actually know about the prosecutor's current investigation of the Jewish partisans?

Ginaite: The pre-trial investigation was initiated in May 2006, after a notice was received from the Genocide and Resistance Research Centre of Lithuania (this centre has studied exclusively the atrocities committed against Lithuanians during the Soviet occupations). The centre sent a notice against a group of anti-Nazi fighters in the Rudnicky forest, accusing them of participating in the murder of 38 residents of Koniuchy in January 1944.

As this allegation had no juridical or moral grounds, there resulted no valid prosecution of any kind. The prosecutors never informed anyone or explained the aim of their "investigation" – everything was kept secret in this Kafkaesque procedure. Certainly, it had little to do with identifying war crimes and seeking to bring the alleged perpetrators to trial.

Nor does it seem to have anything to do with justice. Its goal is to create a negative image of Jewish partisans in particular and Holocaust survivors in general, and to present Jews as being disloyal, as well as perpetrators in the suffering of Lithuanians under the Soviets. It encourages the perception of two genocides, a kind of symmetry of suffering. The prosecutor may have responded to pressure from some rightist politicians and began the investigation even while knowing that he will not be able to charge anyone with a war crime, because there wasn't one.

Sara Ginaite recently spoke about her experiences as a partisan in Lithuania, during Holocaust Education Week in Toronto.

Bringing them back in

According to Sergio Della Pergola, Israel's foremost demographer, Canada's 375,000 Jews constitute the fourth-largest Jewish community in the world. Israel comes first (5.55 million) followed by the United States (5.3 million) and France (490,000). The rest of the world's 13.5 million Jews live in some 100 countries around the globe.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

We are few in number. Although the media have much to say about our influence, and enemies ascribe sinister powers to us, we are, in fact, very vulnerable. Without the existence of Israel, we might now be on the verge of extinction.

The fact that a plurality of the world's Jews now live there is of historic significance. Despite the end of mass aliyah, some 20,000 Jews moved to Israel in the past 12 months. Roughly the same number left the country, but 10,000 Israelis have returned home. As Della Pergola predicted some time ago, soon most of the world's Jews will reside in Israel. While its Jewish population continues to grow, the number of Jews elsewhere is decreasing.

The Diaspora is still central to Jewish life, but there's more to it than American Jewry. Canadians should take note. For although we're the world's fourth-largest Jewish community, we play only a minor role on the international Jewish scene. With extremely few exceptions, it's unlikely that outsiders will recognize the names of locally prominent Canadian Jews. Most mistake us for Americans.

Della Pergola offers more startling statistics. There are twice as many Americans than are currently counted as Jews (11 million in all) who are eligible for automatic Israeli citizenship under its Law of Return. Similarly, though there are only 215,000 Jews in Russia (and another 125,000 in the other former Soviet republics), at least one million are eligible. There are bound to be many such Jews in Canada.

Our challenge is to bring them back into the mainstream. Some movements in Judaism are doing precisely that. Instead of putting up halachic and psychological barriers, they're trying to make re-entry into the fold as easy as possible. They view their endeavour not as a dilution of Judaism, but as one way of securing its future. Such outreach isn't missionary, but an effort to pave a smooth path for the return of lost children.

Canada's Jews have been timid in this respect. Isolationism and smugness seem to rule the day. Openness to marginal Jews is often shunned by the mainstream. If Canadian Jewry aspires to take its rightful place in the struggle for Jewish survival, it could do worse than start with an active program in which different movements co-operate to bring in from the cold to the warmth of Jewish life sisters, brothers, cousins and even more distant relatives.

A week of remembrance

It was far from an ordinary week for the Jewish community in Ottawa. It was an emotional and motivational one, because it was the Holocaust Education Week.

Justin Dahan in Ottawa

The week was jam-packed with events planned by Hillel's Toba Cooper, who had been working tirelessly since August preparing for it. Toba explained the importance of having and organizing the event.

"We are the leaders, decision-makers and commanders of our generation, and we have the power to prevent hate and the senseless recurrences of atrocities such as the Holocaust. It is my hope that Hillel's events work to see that such atrocities never happen again," she said.

The first event was an Oct. 30 lecture at the University of Ottawa by Prof. Irving Abella titled "Resisting the Holocaust in Canada," about his book None Is Too Many. The world-class speaker and historian delivered a powerful speech about Canada's response, or lack thereof, to the Holocaust.

Abella wasn't the only lecturer to speak. Vera Shiff discussed her experiences in Theresienstadt in a passionate talk about what she was forced to endure and about how the concentration camp operated.

Holocaust education should be important to every Jewish person, but it's hardly specific to just Jews. Both U of O and Carleton University were transformed into places of Holocaust education for the week, with exhibit boards placed inside heavily populated buildings for all to see. The result went beyond educating Jews to become a way to educate those who might not have a personal connection with the Holocaust.

The booths were able to reach a diverse swath of people. As Toba put it, "The entire university community was able to encounter images and the chronological history of the Second World War."

Alpha Epsilon Pi, a Jewish fraternity, also felt the need to add some programming to the Holocaust Education Week. Jon Telch, president of AEPi's Ottawa chapter received a list of those who died in the terrors of the Holocaust from Yad Vashem in Jerusalem. Names in hand, Jon and the rest of the Alpha Epsilon Pi brotherhood went to Parliament Hill to recite the names, birthplaces, ages and places of death. Many members of the Ottawa Jewish community, as well as others, came out to support this moving event.

Jon explained the importance of the event for AEPi members: "Each and every one of our brothers has a personal connection with the Holocaust, and we view it as the highest priority and duty for us to remember the six million victims who perished."

He added: "If you read one name every year, then that person didn't die in vain, because we remember them for the sacrifices they made. [SS chief Heinrich] Himmler said, 'I wish to target Jewish children so we don't create Jewish avengers,' but I view it as a generation of commemorators."

The week concluded with an inspirational Shabbat dinner where survivors and guest speakers delivered accounts of their lives and their relationship to the Holocaust.

The week went off without a hitch. It was truly a great memorial week for a worthy cause. The city of Ottawa owes Toba Cooper thanks for all the hard work and preparation she put in to help create a memorable Holocaust Education Week.

The crazy ties that bind

I was contacted at the start of my third year in Halifax to write this monthly column for The CJN. Then, as now, I wasn't entirely sure what I should write about.

Jesse Mintz in Halifax

More than a year later, and mid-way through my final year in university, I've written on topics ranging from the prospects for peace to the politics of Israel, Canada and the United States. All of these topics, while interesting and controversial – judging by the letters to the editor they've generated – might be seen by some as beyond the scope of this column.

This month's piece is about one topic that I have yet to broach in my monthly ramblings: what it means to be a Jewish student on campus.

It may seem to many that I am an odd choice to pen a column on this subject. Neither my personal political and religious inclinations, nor the general political and social milieu of my campus, can be said to be standard for a Canadian university.

For this reason, I've generally chosen to write on specific political and social issues while shying away from more personal matters that speak to all Jews on an intimate level.

It's far easier to remain a social critic on the sidelines than to put yourself into a story. But four years into university and more than a year into my time with this paper, I've a learned a couple of things.

I've learned that it doesn't really matter what my personal relationship is with the local rabbi, the Halifax religious community, or God in general. It doesn't matter how I feel about Benjamin Netanyahu, the blockade of Gaza or Israel in general, either.

There are certain commonalities that bond Jew to Jew, similarities that exist beyond and in spite of petty political and social divides. Today's column is about those similarities.

I'm acting in a play this semester. I'm 20 years old and, never having acted, decided that now was as good a time as any to embarrass myself on stage in front of all my friends. I auditioned and was cast in the role of John Williamson in David Mamet's Glengarry Glen Ross.

Needless to say, I'm terrified.

Our production consists of seven actors, as well as a director, producer and stage manager. I'm fortunate that in my first foray into theatre, I've been cast with several very close friends. We recently had our first script read-through. On our first run, we all flubbed parts of the dialogue – myself more than the others – mostly out of sheer nervousness.

But there was one line that gave my friend – a blue-eyed, blond-haired Nova Scotian – particular trouble.

"I'm through with, with this, this, this, this, meshugas," he stammered, finally spitting out the last word, after stumbling over the transliterated Yiddish.

"Is that right?" he asked.

"Well," my roommate and the lead in the play chimed in, "lets ask the token Jew. Jesse, is that right?"

I was about to respond with the correct way to pronounce the term – I was, in fact, going to make it up on the spot, as I've never been able to imitate a Yiddish accent – when two other actors, as well as the stage manager and producer, interrupted.

"Hey, what about us?" they asked in near unison.

It turns out I'm not the only Jew in the production – just, perhaps, the most visible one. It also turns out that none of these previously unknown Jews (unknown to me, anyway) pronounced the term meshugas in the same way. Some put the emphasis on the me, others on the shu, and still others on the gas.

One person's uniquely honed perversion of a Yiddish accent made him sound more like he was on a beach in Jamaica than a shtetl in the old country.

What ensued was a lengthy discussion on how we had gone to school for so long together – some of us for three years now, – and not known that we were part of the same tribe.

What it taught me was that regardless of any differences – and despite how vast these differences may seem – we all share certain similarities.

We have all had a grandparent who, at one time or another, has accused us of meshugas.

The Kirshner File

Portrait of a talented, amoral filmmaker

Ferociously ambitious, smart, talented, attractive and supremely pragmatic, with an eye on the main chance, Leni Riefenstahl was not only an emancipated woman and a celebrity, but doubtlessly one of the most celebrated female filmmakers in the world. In an age when women were expected to be pregnant, barefoot and in the kitchen, to use an old phrase, she blazed new paths. But in carving out a unique niche for herself in Germany, she glorified the Nazi regime and its charismatic leader, Adolf Hitler; hobnobbed with his underlings, including Joseph Goebbels, and was not loathe to use Gypsy slave labourers destined for Auschwitz in one of her movies.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

For a person who was born in a sooty working-class district of Berlin, she was certainly a comer. But after the collapse of the Third Reich, she had to fend off persistent accusations that she was little more than an amoral careerist who had been oblivious to the crimes of a criminal government. To say that she was a controversial figure would be to understate the case. Yet Riefenstahl, born Helene Amalie Bertha Riefenstahl in 1902, was hardly a villain. Never a member of the Nazi party, though certainly one of its greatest propagandists, she made her Faustian accommodation with the new fascist order in Germany, like many German citizens.

Several years after her death, she is the subject of Steven Bach's sweeping and authoritative biography, Leni: The Life and Work of Leni Riefenstahl (Alfred A. Knopf), a work of historical investigation that is short on rhetoric and long on balance. As he archly suggests, Riefenstahl was a study in self-absorption, content to drift through the political and economic convulsions of Weimar Germany in the 1920s and early 1930s.

By the age of 21, she was bursting with energy and ambition, dreaming of self-improvement. She tried to make it as a dancer, but left the stage after injuring her left knee. Turning to cinema, she appeared half nude in a 1925 documentary, Ways to Strength and Beauty, that promoted physical fitness and calisthenics. The film was a sensation and brought her to the attention of Arnold Fanck, a director of alpine movies, in which skiers and mountain climbers communed with and battled nature.

Riefenstahl officially launched her career in Fanck's The Holy Mountain, the first of several such films. Most critics showered her with praise, but some questioned her acting abilities. Bach's appraisal is unsparing. "Her lack of dramatic training… shows." Emboldened by the box office receipts of The White Hell of Piz Palu, shot on location in Switzerland's Bernina Alps, she became the prime mover and creative force behind The Blue Light, a 1932 alpine film. The reviews in Berlin's mainly Jewish-owned newspapers were unflattering, with reviewers suggesting that it suffered from phony romanticism. "What do these Jewish critics understand about our mentality?" Riefenstahl complained. "They have no right to criticize our work." Going one step further, she said, "As long as the Jews are film critics, I'll never have a success. But watch out. When Hitler takes the rudder, everything will change." These were rather strange remarks, considering subsequent rumours that Riefenstahl was of partial Jewish ancestry through her mother, Bertha Ida Scherlach. Although this allegation was never proved, and repudiated by Hitler himself, it would resurface when she was already a glittering star.

Riefenstahl's relationship with the Nazi movement began with the release of The Blue Light. Overcoming her indifference to politics, she attended a Nazi rally in Berlin, urged to do so by an acquaintance who was sure she would be repelled by its vulgarity. To his surprise, she was impressed by Hitler. "It was like being struck by lightning." Bach, in voluminous detail, explains how she insinuated herself into Nazi circles and became a fixture at elite party social functions. Apart from Hitler, she met a succession of luminaries ranging from Goebbels – the propaganda minister – to Hermann Goering, the second most powerful man in Germany.

Her relations with Hitler remained cordial, despite an incident in which she expressed distress at his racial policies and the emigration of so many Jewish artists and intellectuals, some of whom she had known. He basically dismissed her demarche and suggested that she could better spend her time making a film about the 1933 Nazi party congress in Nuremberg, the first such rally since Hitler became chancellor. Hitler had immense faith in her, believing she had the artistry to make a documentary that would transcend "ordinary newsreel footage." Victory of Faith premiered in December of that year and, by one estimate, was seen by 20 million Germans in theatres, schools and community halls. Hitler, thrilled by its power, asked Riefenstahl to record the 1934 Nazi party congress rally. Triumph of the Will vindicated Hitler's confidence in her talents. A masterpiece, it broke box office records and prompted Goebbels to gush, "Whoever has seen and experienced the face of [Hitler] in Triumph of the Will, will never forget it."

Leni Riefenstahl at work on one of her documentaries

This was followed by Day of Freedom, which paid homage to the resurrection of Germany's armed forces. She next embarked on Olympia, a brilliant tribute to the 1936 Olympic summer games in Berlin. As she prepared for this assignment, the president of the German Olympic Committee, Theodor Lewald, was relieved of his duties, his grandmother having been Jewish. Olympia was the dazzling centrepiece of gala premieres in Europe, and in promoting it in press interviews, she described Hitler as "the greatest man who ever lived." Yet, much to her disappointment, Olympia failed to secure distribution in Britain, the United States and Canada.

In 1938, shortly before Kristallnacht, she landed in the United States on a tour. When she was asked to respond to that pogrom, a prelude to the Holocaust, she claimed that the universal outrage it elicited was a "slander" on her homeland. Bach observes, "Her disbelief was a pose, surprisingly crude and unsubtle." Returning to Germany three months later, she learned the truth, saying she had "found out things that I would never have believed possible."

A patriot, she formed a combat photography unit after the outbreak of World War II. She left for the front in September 1939, only days after Germany's invasion of Poland. There, in a town where Polish partisans had killed a German officer and four soldiers, she witnessed a massacre of civilians. After the fall of France and Hitler's triumphal visit to Paris in 1940, Riefenstahl sent him an effusive congratulatory telegram.

Being in the regime's good graces, she was allowed to establish one of only three private film companies in Germany. As the war raged, she started work on Tiefland, her first feature and one of the most expensive movies in German film history. Adapted from an opera, Tiefland used Roma extras who could pass as Spaniards. Having fulfilled their tasks, they were shipped to Poland to their deaths.

With Germany's defeat, she was temporarily detained by the U.S. occupation, claiming that her contacts with the Nazi hierarchy had been perfunctory. She never regained her status as a filmmaker, but Tiefland – which Bach puts down as "a kitsch curiosity" – was released in 1954. In the decades to come, she made something of a comeback, photographing the graceful Nuba people of Sudan and producing a marine film, Underwater Impressions, that even Bach indirectly praises. Even in her 80s and 90s, Riefenstahl was a trooper, concealing ailments and fighting off evidence of old age. But hard as she tried to banish the past, she never quite brushed off the taint of her self-serving association with Nazi Germany.

Rabin remembered at memorial

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Thirteen years since the assassination of Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, people all over the world still gather to pay respect to a man who died as he lived, promoting the cause of peace in Israel.

In Toronto, more than 300 people gathered Nov. 10 at the Lipa Green Building to take part in a memorial dedicated to Rabin, who was assassinated in 1995 by a Jewish extremist who opposed Rabin's signing of the Oslo accords.

The service, both in Hebrew and English, included songs, a video presentation, dances and messages from community leaders, including UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's chair David Koschitsky and Israel's consul general in Toronto Amir Gissin.

Yitzhak Rabin

Yaen Vered, a shaliach for the Israel Antiquities Authority who had a 24-year career in the Israeli military and retired as a colonel, was the keynote speaker.

Hassida David, the MC for the evening's ceremony – organized by the Israeli House, a branch of the Israeli consulate that offers cultural and social programming for Toronto's Israeli community – said she was one of the tens of thousands of people who gathered in the Rabin Square in Tel Aviv last year to participate in the 12th peace rally to pay her respect to the memory of a leader who was embarking on a road to peace.

"He was in the midst of paving a new way, but three shots, aimed at his back, not facing him, put a bitter end to all that he had worked for and fought for throughout his entire life," David said.

"Around the area, where this despicable event took place, there were young people saluting, lighting candles, and amongst them was a young father, holding his three-year-old son on his shoulders."

She said the little boy saw a picture of Rabin in his military uniform, when he was Israel's chief of staff.

"The three-year-old child asked his father, 'Dad, was he a soldier?' He said, 'Yes.'

"'Did he die in the war?' And he said, 'Yes, in the war for peace.'"

David told the audience that they must embrace Rabin's legacy and teach generations to come that "this is our only chance to live in our homeland far from bloodshed."

Gissin attempted to relate the relationship of Rabin and Israel, to the relationship between Israelis and the Diaspora.

Consistent with the message Gissin usually delivers when speaking to a Jewish audience, he said that Israelis "have failed miserably to learn the lesson of Yitzhak Rabin's death when we are conveying the Israeli message and building relationships with Jewish communities around the world."

He said the biggest mistake Israelis make is to continue "in a very stubborn way" to involve Jewish communities in the Diaspora in Israel's internal conflicts.

He added that the debate over borders is a legitimate one, but it is one best left for Israelis to deal with.

"It is the most important debate the Israeli society is facing… but when we speak to the world, especially when we talk to the Jewish community, we should remember that we're gaining nothing by exporting the internal conflict."

Koschitsky, speaking on behalf of UJA, commended Gissin for "speaking from the heart" but reminded the gathering of the Jewish value that "all of Israel [is] responsible for one another.

"This was prime minister Rabin's legacy and we should live by it."

Quoting Rabin from one of his addresses, Koschitsky said, "There is a very strong link that will forever be in our hearts. There is a sense of responsibility that we carry for each other, regardless of our diversified views."

Vered, who said he knew Rabin vaguely, being in the outer circle of his acquaintances, spoke fondly about the kind of man Rabin was.

"He was flexible to changing his views and acknowledging mistakes. Rabin represents a generation that disappeared from the leadership ranks of Israel… He was a sabra that represented all the good we sabras acquire."

He said the leaders who came after him were of the younger generation, all Israeli born, who knew of the Holocaust and the creation of the State of Israel through history lessons.

"That has much to say about what happened later in Israel."

Vered said that the attitude in Israel after the Yom Kippur War in 1973 turned from "what can we give to the state" to "what can the state give to me."

Although Israel is becoming increasingly westernized, and Israeli priorities are becoming more capitalist, he said "there exists no Jew, who doesn't want peace. We pray for it in every prayer and every time we say Kaddish…

"There is a search and a real wish for peace. There are differences in views on how to achieve it, but the urge for peace didn't fade away after the assassination of Rabin."

He said that Rabin's memory is a national one that doesn't belong to any faction.

"Rabin model teaches us that you cannot kill democracy and democratic decisions by killing the torch holder. In democracy, we should discuss the important matters of communal life. We may differ in views, but respect the other side and his opinions," Vered said.

"Rabin's heritage is that."
